Mr. HAUGEN. Your contention is that they manipulate the price of it?

Mr. BURLESON. Not only that, but as to its quality, permit me to read to you——

Mr. HAUGEN. I do nt want to take up your time. I do not question your statement about the price. I simply wanted to know as to the quality of cotton that is being delivered at the exchange in New York.

Mr. NEVILLE. If Mr. BURLESON will pardon me, I introduced yesterday, before this committee as a witness, a gentleman who is now in the employment of the Agricultural Department, making the standard types that Mr. BURLESON offered the resolution for a year ago. That gentleman testified as an expert and under oath of allegiance to the United States, in the honest discharge of his duties, that he had classed the cotton referred to—some of the cotton referred to—in the New York stock, and that it was all merchantable and spinable cotton called for in the trade certificate.

Mr. HAUGEN. Now, what I want to know is if Mr. BURLESON excepts that statement.

Mr. BURLESON. No. I do not.

Mr. HAUGEN. As a fact?

Mr. BURLESON. No; I do not believe this cotton is desired by spinners.

Mr. HAUGEN. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. BURLESON. I will read from Mr. Marsh himself on that point:

> The reserve (actual cotton) of the New York Cotton Exchange must always be taken from those kinds of cotton which for the time being spinners are not buying freely, and which consequently holders of cotton in the South are willing to part with at a concession for the sake of getting their money out of them.

Mr. HOWELL. Then, I think my question comes in.

Mr. BURLESON. Permit me to finish my answer to Mr. HAUGEN. What is the quality of cotton? Mr. Marsh says it is cotton the spinners are not buying freely—in other words, cotton they do not want. What character of cotton is it? I will now read from a report by the chairman of one of the important committees of the New York Cotton Exchange. Are you willing to accept declarations made in his report? You ought to be willing to accept his admissions. What did he say [reads]:

> The cotton world is demanding that we must represent the real trading basis, the spot prices, for spinners' cotton, not prices based on overs, low grades, and speculations.

Now you will remember I asked Mr. Marsh the question: "Mr. Marsh, what is it that fixes the price of future contracts?" He says, "It is an offer to sell on the part of one man and the acceptance of this offer by another that fixes the price of the future contract." "What are those prices based on?" "They are based upon the cotton that is in the warehouses of the New York Cotton Exchange tenderable on these contracts. This is true, because a man bids with the expectation of paying for that which he is going to receive." "What is he going to receive?" "He is going to receive the quality of cotton that is in the warehouse." "What is in the warehouse?" "Low grades, or cotton not being bought by spinners, and overs." You can not get away from it.

Mr. COCKS. Yes; but you said sometimes it was very high-grade cotton.

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, yes. Now, wait a minute.

Mr. COCKS. I am confused. I am getting a little mixed about this.

Mr. BURLESON. And yet there is no reason why you should be. I tried to make it as plain as I could. When the trade does not want high-grade cotton, when there is a great superabundance of high grades, then the accumulation in the New York Cotton Exchange is of the very high grades, because those are the characters of grades that the spinners are not buying freely.

Mr. COCKS. Then would not that raise the price?

Mr. BURLESON. Raise the market price?

Mr. COCKS. Yes; deliverable on contract?

Mr. BURLESON. On the contrary, the fact that these grades are not wanted, but at the same time are overvalued, makes a man run away from it. They can not sell them, hence the price of futures is depressed.

Mr. COCKS. Yes; but it ought to make the price higher of the poor cotton.

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, not at all; because those grades are overvalued and——

Mr. COCKS. If I have a carload of horses to sell and the valuation is based on the best horse in the car, of course a low-priced horse is going to bring what I consider an over-high price.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; but when they overvalue the high grades, and you do not want them and they have them, and you know——

Mr. COCKS. Yes; but even so, if my other horse is going to be delivered, that low-priced horse, at the price of the high one——

Mr. BURLESON. You must remember that this is a basis contract. You do not get all high grades of cotton; it is a basis contract. That is where the difficulty comes in of understanding it.

Mr. HAWLEY. You read an extract there from some remarks of Mr. Marsh a moment ago, and I did not hear your conclusion. Did you deduce from his remarks that he admitted that the cotton in the warehouses in New York was not merchantable or spinable?

Mr. BURLESON. It was the character of cotton that the spinners are buying least freely; that is, the cotton that is the least desired by them at the particular time.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wanted to know whether you thought that was an admission on his part that the cotton there was not what you call spinable?

Mr. BURLESON. When it is a low-grade crop, when the character of the crop is low grade, it undoubtedly is.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Mr. Chairman, the only thing that puzzles me in the explanation of Mr. BURLESON is this, that he spoke that we are dealing in nothing but phantom and spook cotton, and I do not understand, therefore, what the cotton has, according to his opinion, to do with the whole matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURLESON. If Mr. Mandelbaum will contain his soul in patience, I will shortly discuss that phase of the matter. I will show him how much of this cotton is spook or phantom cotton and how much of it is actual cotton. But I wanted to show, if I could, and I think I have—that the New York stock, whether high or low grade, is always undesirable. I am anxious to proceed to the next branch of this discussion, because I want to agree with Mr. Marsh. I want to show that as to the second function of an exchange the New York Cotton Exchange fails to meet the test. That is, does it aid in marketing the cotton crop at the least expense to the producer and consumer?

Mr. LEVER. Before you leave this point, I think if you will just explain this proposition you will make it clear to these gentlemen what you have been driving at, and I think you have not made it clear. Whenever there is a very high grade of cotton raised during the course of the year the New York Cotton Exchange overvalues the high grades?

Mr. BURLESON. That is what I have said as plainly as I could state it.

Mr. LEVER. If there is a large crop of low grades, they overvalue the low grades?

Mr. BURLESON. I have so stated.

Mr. LEVER. For the purpose of drawing those grades into the stocks of New York, for the purpose of delivering upon future contracts, for the purpose of depressing the prices of future contracts; is that true?

Mr. BURLESON. I will not say that is the purpose of it. That is the inevitable effect. If it is not wanted, a grade, whether high or low, if tendered on contract, depresses the price of futures.

Mr. LEVER. Is that the effect?

Mr. BURLESON. That is undoubtedly the effect of it; and just one more assertion. I do not know how I can make it plainer than I have already made it by reading Mr. Marsh's statement about it.

Mr. COCKS. I understand Mr. Marsh's statement exactly, I think, but the point I do not understand is, How does overvaluing the high-grade cotton depress the spot market or the price to the producer? That is what I can not see.

Mr. BURLESON. I have not reached in my discussion the effect of the price of futures on spots, but I promise to submit data bearing thereon which will be to your complete satisfaction. The point now is the character of the New York stock, and I could not make my meaning plainer if I were to state it a thousand times. Mr. Marsh expresses it exactly in his statement. With a wonderful facility for conveying the thought in his mind, he expressed it exactly, and much better than I could, when he said:

> The reserve of actual cotton in New York must always be derived from those kinds of cotton which for the time being spinners are not buying freely, and which consequently holders of cotton in the South are willing to part with at a concession.

That is, the men who grow the cotton, whether it is high or low grade cotton, which at the particular time is not being sought by the spinner, are willing to get rid of it at a concession in order to dispose of it.

Mr. COCKS. Is not that true in regard to everything? If I go into Kansas City with a carload of heavy hogs, and there happens to be an overplus of heavy hogs on the market, I may have to carry those particular hogs over until the next day.

Mr. BURLESON. That is all right, but suppose it was within some one's power to use the price offered or given you for this undesirable load of hogs as a standard to measure the value of the desirable hogs that were being brought there by other people; would not that be unfair?

Mr. COCKS. Sure.

Mr. BURLESON. Would it not be unjust?

Mr. COCKS. And on the other hand, suppose the high-priced load of hogs was used as a standard to value the hogs of everybody else. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURLESON. But suppose that those hogs must be disposed of——

Mr. COCKS. Oh, never mind; they are good hogs and they will keep. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. I think there is a misunderstanding of what you are getting at.

Mr. BURLESON. There is absolutely no misunderstanding on my part.

Mr. SIMS. The cotton exchange, as I understand, puts a value on that high-grade cotton at a time in excess of what you could sell the cotton for in market if delivered to you on the contract?

Mr. BURLESON. That is it.

Mr. SIMS. And therefore, instead of taking the delivery and selling out the cotton——

Mr. BURLESON. They run away from it.

Mr. COCKS. I understand that, but I do not see how that depresses the price to the man who brings a bale of cotton in that very day. It looks to me like he must be getting a big price for his cotton if it is based on the low-grade cotton.

Mr. ELLERBE. Is it true or is it not true—I must confess I have not seen a published statement in some months, but is it not true—that approximately a year ago there was in the neighborhood of 35,000 or 40,000 bales of cotton in New York that was considered unspinable, and that that cotton, according to all newspaper reports, was used to depress prices?

Mr. BURLESON. Of course I have no knowledge of that. I read what Mr. Price said about it.

Mr. ELLERBE. Is it not true that two months ago, taking the grades of cotton from the top to the bottom, there was a very small percentage of cotton in the warehouses of New York that was middling or above?

Mr. BURLESON. I have no knowledge about that. I have not seen it.

Mr. ELLERBE. Is it or not true that there are a great many mills in this country that can not spin cotton below strict low middling?

Mr. BURLESON. I have no personal knowledge on that proposition. When I reach that phase of the question in my discussion, I have a certificate of the New York warehouses of the New York Cotton Exchange which I will submit to this committee, which shows exactly the character of the cotton that it had in its warehouses at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Allow me to suggest that it is growing late, and we want to finish the hearings on this branch of the subject this evening, and I think you had better proceed with your argument, Mr. BURLESON.

Mr. BURLESON. Let us see whether the New York Cotton Exchange performs this function of an exchange by marketing this cotton at the least expense. It has been brought out in this testimony that the commission is $7.50 for each 100 bales for the buyer and $7.50 for the seller, or $15 on every 100 bales of sales that take place on the New York Cotton Exchange. That is an admitted fact. Now, these gentlemen who operate the New York Cotton Exchange maintain elaborate establishments in New York. They have typewriters and stenographers and elaborately furnished offices, and the New York Cotton Exchange itself is a palatial structure, and it costs some money to operate that. Many members operate private telegraph lines to warehouses and local agents throughout the country. These expenses, added to commissions which amount to $7,500,000, must amount to a vast sum. Is this all? By no means. It takes a vast amount of money to finance future transactions—not based on actual cotton, it is true—I have shown that the actual cotton does not go to New York—nevertheless, the burden of all this expense rests on the actual crop.

Consider for a moment the money required for future transactions. If $2 per bale is required by way of margin on each transaction of 100 bales, the buyer and seller between them put up $400. It is a simple matter of caculation to arrive at the result showing that first and last on 50,000,000 bales of cotton $100,000,000 would be required in margins from the seller and a like amount from the buyer. Of course these vast sums are not all required at one and the same time, but when it is used someone pays interest thereon. Now, if a fluctuation in price takes place, a further margin is required; for every 20 points an additional dollar per bale must be put up. And if a violent fluctuation occurs and a change of as much as 100 points is made in the market price, it would represent on the year's transaction one-quarter of a billion dollars. I would not have you believe for a moment that any such sum of money or credit is called in use at one time, but during the cotton season covering the full year this vast sum in the aggregate may be required, and if so, some one pays tribute therefor in the way of interest. What in the way of additional burden does this place on the actual crop? It staggers one who attempts to make the calculation. Upon whom does the burden of that rest? Where does it fall? Mr. BEALL repeatedly during the hearings asked the question, "Where does it rest; where does it rest?" I do not agree with the statement contained in Commissioner Smith's report that it rests upon the speculator. Not a bit of it. Mr. Chairman, there is no peculiarity hedging around cotton which exempts it from the operations of the ordinary laws of trade. If I have a horse that I want to sell, and I propose to sell through a broker and that broker is going to charge me 5 per cent for his services, and I wanted to realize $95 for my horse I would just add $5 to my price and sell my hose for $100. The man who bought it would of course bear the burden of the broker's commission.

Mr. COCKS. He might make you split the commission. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURLESON. He would if he was as smart as the people on Long Island. You may reverse the proposition. If a man wants to buy a horse and he is going to buy through a broker and he has got $100, he goes to his broker and says, "I want to buy a horse and I have $100," and the broker replies, "I will charge $5 to buy a horse for you. I know all about horses, I am a good judge of horses, and I will do the best I can for you." The man says, "Here is my $100. Go out and buy the horse." The broker takes the $100, deducts from it his 5 per cent, goes out and buys for his customer a horse that costs $95. There is no escaping the proposition that the burden of this broker's commission rests on the buyer or seller. Mr. Marsh laid down the correct rule. It is a rule of trade that is as old as the hills. No modern development can possibly change it or enable anyone to evade it. On a declining market the seller bears the burden and on an advancing market the consumer bears the burden. In principle I agree with Mr. Marsh exactly, but I do not exactly agree with him when he says that finally on a rising market the ultimate consumer in Canton, in Manchuria, or in the jungles of Africa, wherever cotton goods are bought, bears this burden. Now, in one state of the case that may be true, because it is human nature for the original buyer—consumer—of the cotton goods to unshoulder this burden, if he can, and if the price continues to advance he does unshoulder it on the ultimate consumer. But suppose the price fluctuates just at the time he is ready to dispose of his goods and a decline takes place, then, as has been stated here, there is in a measure a parity between the cost of raw cotton and the cost of cloth, and if the price fluctuates before he sells his goods, and begins to decline, then the original consumer, the spinner, is unable to unload the burden on the ultimate consumer, and he must bear it himself. Consider for a moment this stupendous burden. Can you conceive of a more uneconomical situation? A product of 5,000,000 of people, consumed by a few thousand spinners here and a few thousand spinners abroad; can anyone offer a reason why the cost of marketing their crop should be increased by these stupendous charges? Can any man question the proposition that at the least, under these conditions, under the admissions made by Mr. Marsh himself, this crop is not marketed at the least expense to the producer and the consumer? So you see the cotton exchanges fail to perform the second important function of the legitimate exchange.

Now, let us see whether the cotton crop is distributed expeditiously throughout the world by the aid of these exchanges. That is the third important and necessary function of an exchange. I have shown you that they have signally failed in performing the first two functions of an exchange. Now, let us see whether they fulfill the third function of an exchange—to aid in expeditiously distributing this crop throughout the world wherever it is needed. I say they do not. I have only to cite the testimony of Mr. Hubbard this morning in response to a question asked by Mr. HEFLIN, "Do you know of cotton being shipped back?" Now, catch exactly what the function is. The third function of a cotton exchange is to expeditiously distribute the cotton to those who are going to consume it, to distribute the raw material to those who are going to use it—to the mills. And yet Mr. Hubbard said that the conditions on the New York Cotton Exchange had been such that he had known, or had heard, and admitted it to be a fact, that cotton grown in America, after it had reached the coasts of Great Britain or Europe, en route to the consumer, had been, for the purposes of gambling pure and simple, in order to meet the demands of speculation by cotton merchants, turned in its course and found its way back across the ocean to be tendered on future contracts at the New York Cotton Exchange. Is that the only ground upon which I can base an assertion that these exchanges do not aid in expeditiously distributing the cotton crop? By no means. Did you not hear Mr. Parker, did you not hear Mr. Mandelbaum, did you not hear Mr. Neville say that when these violent fluctuations take place on the New York Cotton Exchange and prices go down, cotton farmers stop selling? No sales occur while fluctuations are taking place. The farmer lives in hope that the price will advance, and instead of disposing of his crop expeditiously, in order that it may find its way into the ordinary channels of trade to those who are going to consume it, he holds it. Thus these exchanges obstruct commerce, obstruct and interfere with the distribution of the cotton crop rather than assist it. Now, is there a man here who will question that? Can any fair-minded man question it?

Now, gentlemen, let me move on to what I regard as the most indefensible feature connected with this whole business. The New York Cotton Exchange, during the period of its usefulness, operated under a rule of fixing differences between grades, so that such differences were measured by the commercial difference in the values between the grades. The law of supply and demand measured what that difference in value should be. Now understand, gentlemen, we have reached the period in the history of the world where the consumption of cotton is in excess of production by probably 1,000,000 bales. There is no question about this. The suggestion has been made about the spinner not taking cotton, that the producers might become the victims of the spinners who might not buy. Yet if they should cease to take cotton, if they did not buy the product to keep the spindles moving in Manchester, for instance, there would be riots in the streets of that city within 60 days.

Mr. COCKS. Even though they were manufacturing cotton at a loss?

Mr. BURLESON. Well, Mr. Cocks, I have never yet found any business where a man, either in law or in morals, is entitled to an insurance that he will make a profit.

Mr. COCKS. Except under the tariff. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURLESON. It is claimed by some that they do not always make it, even if high.

Mr. COCKS. I can not quite get your point. As I understand, you would try to make me believe that the cotton spinner is going to buy this cotton anyhow, whether he is going to make a profit or not, because there would be a riot if he did not. That is the point I do not see.

Mr. BURLESON. I do not say that he has to buy cotton anyhow. He can not buy it unless the producer sells it. If the producer burned his cotton, of course the spinner could not buy it. But, Mr. Cocks, it is a law of economics that when one man has something he wants to sell and another man has a use for that something and wants to buy it, it is natural that they should get together, and I have no fear that the cotton grower and the cotton spinner will fail to get together. When the New York Cotton Exchange started upon its career under its rules it fixed the difference between the grades of cotton in accordance with the values as determined by the law of supply and demand. During the first 10 years of its existence the New York exchange fixed these differences just as they are now fixed in Liverpool, and just as they have always been fixed in New Orleans. Then the period arrived when New York commenced to decline as a spot market. As you know, it is impossible to operate the exchange without having some cotton there to be used for purposes of tender on contracts. If cotton will not go there at a loss, they must create a condition that will bring it there. How did they do it? Why, it was a serious problem confronting these gentlemen, how they were going to get the necessary cotton to come there. Now, who is my authority for that? Mr. Marsh. He says:

> One of the most serious problems of the cotton exchange has been and is to so frame these contracts that a sufficient supply of actual cotton will readily come to New York to insure the maintenance of the reserve.

How can they get the necessary cotton to come there? He tells you now that the cotton that comes there is the cotton that is not being freely bought by the spinners.

Mr. MARSH. At the time.

Mr. BURLESON. At the time. Oh, yes; at the time. Now, gentlemen, I will tell you how they do get the necessary cotton there, and this is the secret of the adoption of the fixed difference plan, their fixed difference system. The exchange would not have it if it could exist without it. They would prefer, if it were possible, to adopt some other system; but the only way they can get the cotton there for this necessary reserve is by an arbitrary overvaluation of certain grades. This action draws these grades to their reserves. Do they overvalue it? Let us see. By reference to the chart opposite page 160 in volume 1 of this report—and you gentlemen will have this before you when you come to the consideration of this bill—it will be seen that for several years past the New York differences for low middling and good ordinary cotton have as a rule been much too narrow. In other words, these grades were overvalued relatively to middling. What is the effect of overvaluing them? The grades thus overvalued seek the place where they command the best price. Understand, Mr. Chairman, that these grades are not being bought freely by the spinners. Why is it that in a crop year where it is a low-grade crop they overvalue the lower grades and if the crop is a high-grade crop they overvalue the higher grades? Why is it they overvalue the grades that the spinners are not buying freely? I will show you why. I read from page 291:

> At the same time there can be no doubt, in view of statements obtained in the course of the investigation, that large operators, in the New York market particularly, were able years ago, when the commercial differences were applicable on future contracts or when revisions were made monthly, to manipulate prices on a rather extensive scale. This raises the question whether this manipulation may not have been due in large degree to the narrowness of the New York spot market. As shown elsewhere (see p. 247), transactions in spot cotton in New York at that time had already decreased very sharply from the totals of earlier years. Furthermore, the range of grades principally received in the New York market had narrowed greatly, that market in the main receiving only the surplus or temporarily undesirable grades. It is obviously easier to manipulate the prices of such grades than of those which are in active demand, since in the case of the latter any important change in price ordinarily will be vigorously contested as the result of free competition.

For instance, they could not easily manipulate the grades that the spinners wanted. They could not overvalue the grades that the spinners wanted, because the spinners would say, "We want these grades, and we will contest the matter with you." They overestimate the value of those grades that the spinners do not want. In a low-grade crop the lowest grades are least in demand; in a highest-grade crop ordinarily the highest grades are being bought less freely.

Now, directly on that point, go back to page 253:

> For the high grades the differences on the New York Cotton Exchange have been more nearly in line with commercial differences. Nevertheless, in the high-grade crop year of 1903–4 the difference at New York for good middling was, for a considerable period, materially greater than the commercial differences existing at New Orleans, thus overvaluing that grade.

Good middling is one of the higher grades and hence in 1904, a high-grade crop year, it was overvalued——

Mr. COCKS. How did the overvaluing of these low grades that the spinners did not want hurt the producer?

Mr. BURLESON. Because they sell a basis contract, and it pulls down the price of the futures.

Mr. COCKS. That is a future for that stock?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

Mr. COCKS. And yet you say it is overvalued; and yet the cotton would be overvalued, the spot cotton?

Mr. BURLESON. The seller would not have to deliver to you a single bale of that. As a matter of fact, the buyer bids less because of this overvalued cotton. The seller could deliver any of the different sorts of grades on this contract, but of course will deliver such grades as will prove most profitable to him.

Mr. COCKS. But that would be quoting the future that day in New York, upon which would be based the pay at Houston, we will say, for spot cotton?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

Mr. COCKS. Would not that be a little bit higher than usual, then?

Mr. BURLESON. Because of the fact that certain grades are overvalued, if a man was going to buy one of these future contracts, it is natural that he would bid lower for it because he would probably have to take these grades at a price higher than their commercial value. Every contract on the New York Cotton Exchange is of that character. They do not sell a contract for a particular grade of cotton; they sell a basis contract upon which at present 28 different grades are deliverable.

Mr. LAMB. Before my friend finishes his earnest speech along this line, I want to say that this committee, and I am a member of it, is deeply interested in this question, and if we look at it purely from an economic and business standpoint, as he has been arguing it so well here, I claim that this Congress has no right in this matter to pass this bill. On the other hand, if the New York Exchange is engaged in a gambling enterprise, and this is a moral question, such as the question in regard to the Louisiana lottery was, then we have some right. I would like to hear the gentleman on that point.

Mr. BURLESON. I want to be perfectly candid with the committee on that point. I will not say that the moral phase of this matter does not appeal to me, but I have not considered these moral phases in arriving at my conclusions, nor do I make them the basis for my earnest insistence for the adoption of this measure. It is true, gentlemen, that the Federal Government passed a law that destroyed the Louisiana lottery, denying it the use of the telegraph and the telephone and the mails, solely because of its demoralizing effect on the people. It is true there is no one here who will say that there ever was a suicide that resulted because of the existence of the Louisiana lottery; there never was a bankruptcy brought about by the existence of that institution; there never was an embezzlement or a defalcation or a betrayal of trust by reason of the purchase of a dollar ticket in order to secure a chance for the capital prize in the New Orleans lottery. It is true we can not say that with reference to the New Orleans Cotton Exchange.

Mr. BEALL. You mean the New York Cotton Exchange?

Mr. BURLESON. Well, the New Orleans Cotton Exchange or the New York Cotton Exchange, either; it makes no difference to me, because I am against them both. You can not say that with references to these exchanges. But that phase of this matter has not controlled me in the least in the conclusions I have reached on my earnest insistence that this bill should become a law. I am opposed to these future-trading exchanges, because I believe they have become an incubus on the cotton trade. They are a great burden on the spinners and the producers of cotton in this country, who have a right to look to the Federal Government for relief after having done everything possible to relieve themselves. Their practices interfere with the freedom of trade between the cotton producer and consumer, obstructs and hinders trade between the cotton-producing States and cotton consumers, domestic and foreign. Mr. Chairman, we have passed laws in the Southern States driving the representatives of these exchanges from their confines; in every State with the exception of two. This action has, in a measure, curtailed their hurtful operations, but we have not been able to interfere with the interstate traffic in these future contracts. The Senate bill strikes at that evil. When the propaganda was inaugurated in the South against these exchanges, a seat on the New York Cotton Exchange was worth about $23,000, or in the neighborhood of that sum. As we passed laws excluding them from the States, thus diminishing the supply of "lambs," year by year the value of a seat on this exchange depreciated in value until the year 1908, and I have not looked into it since then, but I did look into it then, getting the information that a seat had gone down to $10,000. Mr. Chairman, I deplore the moral degradation caused by these exchanges; I regret the crimes and suicides traceable to speculation thereon, but for the purposes of this discussion what I object to is the uneconomical practices of this exchange and the resulting obstructions and interferences with commerce; and to think that these exchanges have the hardihood to contend that they are necessary because of the assistance they render the cotton trade. But I desire to return to a discussion of the fixed-difference system, the crux of this whole controversy. The fixing of the differences in September amounts to but little.

The CHAIRMAN. Before you start on that fixed-difference proposition, let me make this suggestion, which I think will come in properly in connection with that discussion.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That one of the features of this whole controversy which I am sure interests every member of the committee, is the contention on the part of the representatives of the exchange that elimination of the exchange would harass and hamper the whole cotton trade to the detriment of the producer, to the detriment of the merchant, and to the detriment of the spinner, for the reason that it would compel all of them to transact their business on wider margins and that it would force out of the trade the small man who would not command great capital. Before you close, I hope you will touch on that point.

Mr. BURLESON. I will, Mr. Chairman, before I conclude. But let me show you what the fixing of the differences under the rule of the New York Exchange involves. In November, before it is possible for human wisdom to forecast the character of the crop——

The CHAIRMAN. In September, you mean?

Mr. BURLESON. No; the September fixing amounts to very little.

Mr. BEALL. Is it not a fact that in many instances, even since the September fixing was adopted, there is no action taken?

Mr. BURLESON. Frequently it happens that there is no action taken at the September meeting, sometimes only to reaffirm the action taken at the last November meeting. They will not deny that. This practically means the fixing of the differences in value between these grades of cotton only once during the year. Now, gentlemen, is such a thing possible, considered either economically or from a standpoint of justice and fairness? How can these men making up the revision committee determine the character of the crop yet to be matured and gathered? Even if it were possible to eliminate selfishness on the part of the individual member entirely from consideration, how can this committee know whether the crop is to be of low or high grade, whether there are to be a small per cent of the higher grades or a large per cent? And these factors determine the value of the different grades. How can they tell what these differences in the value between the grades will be? They can not forecast the weather. And right on that point—I will return to a discussion of this—I want to tell you of a conversation I had with Col. John H. Inman, who in his time was the greatest spot-cotton merchant in the world. On one occasion I met him, and in conversation the topic arose as to the real cause of gambling in cotton. I said "You have devoted your life to the cotton trade, and I want you to tell me this. Here are four textile fibers—silk, flax, wool, and cotton—out of which the raiment of the world is manufactured. Why is it that those who want to speculate select cotton, and cotton alone, for that purpose?" He replied, "Mr. BURLESON, it is easy of explanation; there are more elements of doubt and uncertainty entering into the making and marketing of a cotton crop than of any other crop in the world." He further said "Speculation thrives upon uncertainty, and for that reason speculators have seized upon cotton as the product with which they will gamble." Do you not see how convincing and satisfying this explanation is? And yet I have lived to see the time when Mr. Mandelbaum and Mr. Marsh come here and assert that there are more uncertainties, more different conditions, environing the wool trade and the manufacture of wool than the cotton trade. Gentlemen, just in a word I want to say to you, and I speak from an experience of twenty-odd years, cotton is a most uncertain crop to plant and the most difficult in the world to grow. In the first place it is dependent upon a proper season to bring up the seed after it is planted. If you do not get a proper season, and then plant at the proper time, the uncertainties of the weather are against you. Your seed may lie dormant in the earth and never come to the period of germination.

Mr. BEALL. Just as it did in my county this year.

Mr. BURLESON. Just as it did this year in Ellis County, the greatest cotton-producing county in the world. They produce more cotton in Mr. BEALL's home county than in any other in the world; and yet Mr. BEALL will tell you that the conditions were such this year that the cotton did not properly germinate in that county and from a practical standpoint did not germinate at all. That is not the only uncertainty the cotton planter must contend against. Cotton, to be successfully grown, must be planted during the early part of the year. There is the uncertainty of the effects of inclement weather. It is the tenderest plant in the world, as Mr. Neville knows and as these gentlemen know; the lightest frost destroys it. It is more tender than any pot plant grown in hothouse.

Mr. NEVILLE. And it is likewise the toughest plant in the world.

Mr. BURLESON. In a certain way, yes; when it reaches a certain stage of growth it is capable of great resistance, especially to heat.

Mr. NEVILLE. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. I repeat, it is the tenderest plant in the world, and the most difficult to secure a proper stand. Are these the only uncertainties? Oh, no. After you have germinated your seed, escaped the frost, and secured your stand, gentlemen, I assert, and without fear of successful contradiction, as I speak from a storehouse of sore experience, there are more creeping, crawling, flying, boring insects that prey upon cotton than upon any other plant ever tended by man. Now, after the uncertainties of weather, after all these insects are combated, after the Mexican boll weevil has preyed upon it, is it possible that you are going to deliver the producer of cotton over to the tender mercies of the worst pests of all, the bull and the bear? [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. The chairman asked you if the New York Cotton Exchange, or the speculative features of it, were abolished, would it not injure the three or four different classes of people that deal in cotton—the producer, the spinner, and the mill man, and so forth?

Mr. BURLESON. I will come to that.

Mr. HEFLIN. Do you think that if the speculative features of the exchange should be abolished we would have spot cotton exchanges all over the South?

Mr. BURLESON. Undoubtedly. There are no dealings in futures on the cotton exchange at Bremen, and that is one of the greatest, most helpful exchanges in the world. Only one exchange in the cotton section deals in futures. And why this solicitude upon the part of these gentlemen from New York about the welfare of the cotton producer? The farmer is the man who produces and furnishes the cotton for everybody, and Mr. Neal, who spoke for all the farmers' organizations the other day, challenged the production of one resolution adopted by them which does not appeal for this legislation. But, gentlemen, this is a mere shaking of the bush. Let me go back to the fixed differences of the New York exchange.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Before you leave that subject, I would like to ask you one question.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. One is in regard to the fixing in November of these differences.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. That is about the time that you and your farmer friends agree that the cotton has been gathered, fixed, and sold.

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, no. We do not so agree.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Do you think it is possible on the 13th of November to form any opinion as to the character of the crop?

Mr. BURLESON. Not with any degree of certainty.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. I understood you to say so.

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, no. I said you could not tell. That is the burden of my——

Mr. MANDELBAUM. I said that you said that you could not tell.

Mr. BURLESON. That is what I say; you can not tell.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. You deny that the crop on the 13th of November could be ascertained to any degree of certainty as to the character?

Mr. BURLESON. I think not.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Now, you said something about the riots in Manchester I would like to know whether you would hold the New York Cotton Exchange responsible for the riots in Manchester?

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, no: I do not hold it responsible for anything it does not do. All I am trying to hold it for is what it actually does, and God knows if I can put upon its shoulders responsibility for that I will be satisfied——

Mr. MANDELBAUM. But why do you expect those riots in Manchester?

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, you say "riots?" I thought you said rises—in prices. [Great laughter.]

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Yes, riots. Why do you expect them in Manchester?

The CHAIRMAN. Pardon me; I do not think it is necessary to go into that. I can explain that in one minute to Mr. Mandelbaum—because I speak his language and Mr. BURLESON does not—that Mr. BURLESON's reference to the bread riots in Manchester was simply his rhetorical expression of his opinion that if they did not keep the spindles going in Manchester there would be riots.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. There is another thing I want to get at, why he expects those riots; why he thinks cotton is so high. That is the basis of those riots, or would be the basis of those riots.

Mr. BURLESON. The chairman says we are not to discuss it. Now, back to the fixed differences.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is Mr. BURLESON making the closing argument in these hearings, and is it the fact that any interruptions and statements of fact must come in while he is speaking now?

Mr. BURLESON. I am perfectly willing to be interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but I think if we are going to bring these matters to a close to-night we will have to let Mr. BURLESON go ahead and finish his statement. He has said he was willing to be interrupted, but I think we had better let him finish without further interruption.

Mr. HEFLIN. My question is whether when he gets through anybody else may make any speech?

The CHAIRMAN. No speech. If there is anything that any gentleman wants to submit he will have that opportunity; but I hope Mr. BURLESON will proceed with as little interruption as possible.

Mr. BURLESON. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a limitation upon human wisdom. The wisest man makes mistakes. Even when self-interest is not involved, even when you eliminate entirely the element of self, we are liable to mistakes. Do you think it is right; do you think it is commercial in November to attempt to forecast the character of this important crop and fix the difference between grades? It is the only commercial body in the world, the New York Cotton Exchange—save the coffee exchange—that attempts this impossible task——

Mr. NEVILLE. And the —— exchange.

Mr. BURLESON (continuing). Which attempt, arbitrarily, by the action of a committee of 17 members, to annul the law of supply and demand. That is what it means. Not only do they assume the ability, in November, before the character of the crop can be forecast, to determine the character that the crop is going to ultimately develop into, but to also determine and fix the differences between the grades without knowledge of the proportion these grades will bear to the whole crop. When you consider the fact that New York's is the greatest cotton exchange in the world, as was said by Mr. Mandelbaum, when you consider the volume of transactions taking place on this exchange, so stupendous as compared to transactions taking place elsewhere that they exert a controlling influence on the trade; when these differences are fixed by this exchange out of line with their real commercial value, the value determined by the law of supply and demand, what a vehicle for wrong it becomes; what a great injury, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, through this instrumentality is done to the 5,000,000 helpless people who are engaged in the production of this staple. What a great wrong can be done to those who consume this cotton, and upon whose prosperity those who produce it must at last depend. And when they come before you practically wringing their hands—the consumers—and tell you that this uneconomical rule, this uncommercial rule of the New York Cotton Exchange, works to their hurt, will you not give ear to them?

A further suggestion, Mr. Chairman, and I proceed upon the assumption that the 17 members of the exchange on the revision committee are going to do the very best they can. I am not going to impugn the honesty of these men; not at all. But, gentlemen, when you consider the fact that the men who have the power to fix these differences are the large operators upon this exchange, when you consider that they are the men who are going to make or lose by virtue of the character of differences that are fixed, how exceedingly dangerous this rule becomes; how indefensible it becomes. Again, gentlemen, suppose, as a matter of fact, that on this committee of 17 there should find their way, year after year, the men who are large spot buyers in the South; suppose, through the great influence which they exert upon the membership of the exchange, it should become possible for these large buyers of spot cotton to control that revision committee, not only does it then become a vehicle through which great wrong can be done, but it becomes a vehicle through which disaster itself may be brought to the entire cotton trade. Now, let us see just for a minute.

Mr. COCKS. What would be the result of having these differences fixed by an impartial body?

Mr. BURLESON. You mean just arbitrarily fixed, as they now fix them?

Mr. COCKS. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. It would be uneconomical, uncommercial, and indefensible.

Mr. COCKS. I mean arbitrarily fixed in January, say.

Mr. BURLESON. That is utterly impossible. I say this because the seed for the crop will not then be in the ground. It is utterly impossible for any tribunal. Why, we have not had a prophet on earth since the days of sacred history.

Mr. COCKS. When would be the time to have them fixed?

Mr. BURLESON. Let them be fixed by the law of supply and demand, changing from time to time as values change.

Mr. LEVER. Each day?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; let them be fixed each day.

Mr. COCKS. By whom?

Mr. BURLESON. As the merchant offers his price or as the spinner offers his price for these products of the farmer, and an acceptance is given by him, thus fixing these values.

Mr. COCKS. Then, as I understand that you emphasize so much fixed differences, why not eliminate any differences as arbitrary? That is what you want to do.

Mr. BURLESON. They should be eliminated, so far as they are sought to be fixed arbitrarily. This power should not be vested in this revision committee or in any other committee upon earth. Now, to resume. I was about to show you who goes on this revision committee, how it is made up, but before I get to the question of who goes on this committee I want to say this: We have heard here a great deal about the action of the revision committee of 1906. I used that year myself in a speech that I made on the floor of the House, and Commissioner Smith used it because it was an abnormal year and it accentuated the situation; it made it stand up, so that the ordinary layman could understand the resulting wrongs and injustices. That is the only reason we have used that year. We do not use it because it is the only year when these differences have been fixed out of line with their commercial value. Not at all. It is a frequent occurrence. I read from page 238 of the report of the Commissioner of Corporations:

> These revisions of November, 1903, and November, 1906, and particularly the latter, are, in the opinion of some members of the cotton trade, only exaggerated instances of a more or less general policy on the part of revision committees of the New York Cotton Exchange to systematically manipulate differences in their own interests.

Now, I am not going to say that this is the case. It is not necessary for me to say that, although I will say, God spare us from being year after year subjected to the temptation of benefiting ourselves, where the opportunity is absolutely placed in our hands, where we are given the power to benefit ourselves, at the expense of our fellows. God deliver me from such temptation. I will not make this accusation, but suppose the large buyers of spot cotton, members of the exchange, could shape the action of the revision committee. What opportunities this would afford! Does it occur? (Continuing to read from pp. 238 and 239 of the Smith report:)

The essence of this contention is that a clique of spot-cotton merchants in New York have for years controlled the revision committees of the exchange, and have through them established improper differences for the express purpose of reaping illegitimate gains. A member of the New York Cotton Exchange said in this connection:

"The money that has been made, particularly by 10 or a dozen firms, in this market in the past 10 years in consequence of these conditions has been very large, and in individual cases it has been extremely large."

This charge that spot-cotton merchants in the New York market have controlled revision committees of the exchange and have systematically established improper differences with the particular object of reaping illegitimate profits is almost impossible to prove, even if true. Owing to the very wide discretion allowed members of the revision committee—

What is that discretion? "Is there a standard by which you are governed, if you are fixing these differences?" I asked the leading member of this committee. "No standard." Absolutely no standard or rule to guide these men in this all-important work which they undertake. (Continues reading:)

Owing to the very wide discretion allowed members of the revision committee and the variety of factors that its members may take into consideration, it is virtually impossible to prove that members of any revision committee have deliberately abused their trust, even though circumstances may point very strongly to such a conclusion.

I suggested a moment ago. Suppose the great injury to the trade which could be wrought if the great firms dealing in spot cotton throughout the South could find their way upon this committee. If they have, what a vehicle of wrong and injustice it is possible for them to make of it. Let us see who gets on this committee. (Continues reading from the Smith report:)

It is a fact that the revision committees of the New York Cotton Exchange have for several years been selected from a limited group of members of the exchange, and mainly from so-called spot-cotton interests. For six years, beginning with 1901, nine such firms were constantly represented on the revision committee, and four other such firms had been so represented for five years.

For six years nine of the great spot-cotton firms dealing with spot cotton in the South have controlled (because 9 is a majority of 17) the action of this committee which fixes the differences in value between the grades of the product of five millions of people. I am going to embody in my remarks the list showing who they are. I will now read only three: George H. McFadden & Bro., S. M. Weld & Co., and Hubbard Bros. & Co. They are the three that lead the band. What can they do? They can so fix these differences as to shape the market price of the entire crop. I do not say these gentlemen do it; but, should they have such power? Why, gentlemen, talk about the poor little speculator about whom there has been so much talk before this committee, and, as you will recall, Mr Marsh particularly discussed him, he is harmless compared with these others. Sometimes I fear we are not getting at the real vitals of this danger. Mr. Marsh spoke of the subsidiary broker, the little chap who scalps around day by day for the purpose of making a living, probably impecunious, with very little capital. What do they care for him? Nothing at all. It is the opportunity afforded these stronger men; it is the danger and menace of these great firms which fix the price of all cotton at last, under the operation of this rule; the price they pay to the producer for his product, and in the end the price that they will grind out of the spinner which concerns us. Now, am I mistaken about that?

Mr. COCKS. Do you not think they have let the price get up a little high lately?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; and, gentlemen, I want to say to you in that connection, that when we inaugurated the campaign against the wire houses throughout the South, having long before destroyed the bucket shop, one of the stock arguments used against their suppression was that if we drove the wire houses from the South we would largely eliminate from the market the bull element (which is naturally found in the cotton section) and in consequence we would never have high prices again. As suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cocks] the price has been a little high lately—in fact, higher at one time in my opinion than is justified even by the fact that the crop is more than 2,000,000 bales short. The advance in price is largely attributable to the short supply, but not wholly, and I am just as much opposed to the manipulation of prices when it operates against the consumer as I am when it operates against the producer. I oppose the gambler putting up the price, and likewise oppose his putting it down. By the way, during these hearings we have heard the bucket shop roundly denounced. I want to say here, with full recollection of the fact that I am under oath, that so far as the bucket shop is concerned it does, in my opinion, infinitely less harm than the operations of the great exchanges. Now, why? I can tell it to you in a breath. The men who operate in the little bucket shops put up their money; one wins and the other loses; the man who wins is the beneficiary; the man who loses is the sole sufferer, the only man affected by the transaction; nobody else is hurt.

But when these great spot operators go upon the floor of the exchange and milk the exchange—"milk the exchange"—now, gentlemen, I am not going to say what that means—they are the ones, gentlemen, who do the serious hurt to the producer and the consumer of cotton, these members of the exchange, within whose power it has been given, by reason of the fact that they know the character of cotton that is in the warehouses, by reason of the fact that they are engaged in the spot business and probably control the major portion of the certificated cotton in the exchange warehouses, these men who can go upon this exchange, and, when they see fit to do it, "hammer the prices down"; they are the men whose actions bring serious hurt. These injuries, as compared with those coming from the bucket shop, would be like comparing the misery, woe, and misfortune that comes from Monte Carlo, where they say there is an average of a suicide a month, to the effects coming from a couple of little pickaninnies shooting craps for pennies in a back alley.

Now I want to read a little further from Commissioner Smith's report. I do not want anyone to ask me what certain of these terms or expressions mean, because, as I told you, I understand the effect of the exchange rules, these uneconomical rules, upon the cotton trade as affecting both the producer and the consumer—I think I understand that—but there are certain phrases used in transactions which take place upon this great mart where merchants are engaged in business with which I am not familiar and which I can not elucidate for you if you ask questions about them.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. I think I have some questions that had better come in before you read that.

Mr. BURLESON. I am perfectly willing to be interrupted.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. I want to ask only one question, and I have to frame it a little, because I want to ask you only one question.

Mr. BURLESON. All right.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. You stated at first that the cotton exchange dealt only in spook and phantom cotton.

Mr. BURLESON. I will tell you what I will do——

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Wait, and let me ask my question, and then you answer it.

Mr. BURLESON. All right, if I can.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. After that you stated about the great wrong that is brought about in cotton or in the fixing of grades or valuing of grades. Of course, the spook and phantom grades are not interested in that; and, in fact, in accordance with your own conclusion, nobody is, because you stated that neither the producer nor the consumer trades on the New York Cotton Exchange. Now, if that be the case, they certainly do not pay the charges, either the one or the other, because neither of them trades there.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Mandelbaum——

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Wait a minute; there is something else in this. Then comes the question of the revision committee made by a lot of spot men. Now, I ask you in all fairness, by whom should they be made unless by the men who are familiar with the cotton? Do you want them made by the speculator or the gambler?

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, no.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Then by whom do you want them made?

Mr. BURLESON. I am trying to show here that the way you make them——

Mr. MANDELBAUM. No; you said that the biggest spot dealers in the country make those differences. I will nail you down exactly to what you said.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, I stick to that statement.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. I nail you to it. Now, who should make the differences—the speculators and the gamblers?

Mr. BURLESON. That is not what I call them, but what you call them.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. The speculators and gamblers? Who under heaven should make them?

Mr. BURLESON. I can answer you in a word. I think they should be made in accordance with the law of supply and demand.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. By whom?

Mr. BURLESON. There are a dozen different ways they might be reached.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. By the gambler and speculator, or by whom?

Mr. BURLESON. By the way, since Mr. Mandelbaum has alluded to the gambler, I want to direct the attention of these gentlemen to the fact that the bill introduced by the chairman of this committee deals alone with the transaction where the seller does not expect to deliver and the buyer does not expect to receive. A transaction denounced by the Supreme Court as a gambling transaction

Mr. MANDELBAUM. This is no answer to my question. You can go to that after you answer that question. Your oratory must stop somewhere. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Mandelbaum said "Who in hell" should make these differences.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. I did not say "Who in hell."

Mr. NEVILLE. He said "Who under heaven." [Great laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, I beg your pardon.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. I said who under heaven should make them.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a serious matter, gentlemen.

Mr. HAUGEN. Have you any remedy to suggest?

Mr. BURLESON. Pass the Scott bill; it will remedy the evil.

Mr. HAUGEN. That has nothing to do with the revision.

Mr. BURLESON. Why?

Mr. HAUGEN. I understand this bill does away with the whole business, the whole transaction?

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, no. It is directed against only one character of transaction.

Mr. HAUGEN. Oh, yes, it does.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, if the New York Cotton Exchange people say that by the elimination of transactions which the Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly held were gambling transactions their business will be destroyed, then I say it ought to be destroyed. I direct attention to the fact that the provisions of the Scott bill define one character of transaction, and is directed exclusively against such, "where the seller does not expect to deliver and where the buyer does not expect to receive." If no such transactions take place upon the cotton exchange in New York, then it can not be hurt. And I will get to the phantom cotton in a minute, if I am ever permitted to proceed.

And, in passing, I desire to say that the only way to fix these differences is to permit the law of supply and demand to fix them.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Through whom?

Mr. BURLESON. For instance, it might be ascertained what the price of spot cotton was in half a dozen different markets, the real spot cotton markets in the South, and average them. That is one way it could be done. Or it could be done (and the only reason why the New York exchange can not do this is because they can not exist if they adopt the plan) by fixing differences day by day based on their spot sales, as they do in Liverpool. They can't do this because of a lack of spot sales.

Mr. HAUGEN. Or in New Orleans?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; as they do in New Orleans.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. I want to state right here that the prices of the revision committee in the last few years have been exactly fixed by the ruling price of the markets of the South and that the exchange has thriven under that system.

Mr. BURLESON. "When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be; when the devil was well, a devil of a monk was he." [Laughter.]

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Would you have them quote the prices of all grades of cotton?

Mr. BURLESON. I desire to discuss that in a few minutes and show you what grades of cotton are actually quoted in the spot market. I will do so before I conclude, but I would like to get along now. There are a number of matters I want to direct attention to, and if I am in error I want it pointed out.

Mr. COCKS. That seems to me one of the very important things, and I do not quite get it in my mind yet what it would be if we eliminate this fixed difference, how it could be provided for.

Mr. BURLESON. Fix them at what they actually are in the cotton markets as they are fixed by the law of supply and demand.

Mr. COCKS. Fix it each day?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; each day as at Liverpool and New Orleans.

Mr. COCKS. It would not be fair to fix it for a week or a month?

Mr. BURLESON. Who can anticipate market conditions that far ahead?

Mr. COCKS. You can average it, and cotton runs about such grades, and it seems to me you could do that. It is all Dutch to me, of course.

Mr. BURLESON. I understand that, Mr. Cocks.

The CHAIRMAN. I hope the gentlemen of the committee will allow Mr. BURLESON to proceed.

Mr. BURLESON. This part of Commissioner Smith's report has some bearing on the matter of differences, and I was about to read it when interrupted. I read from page 261 of the report:

> In addition to the charge that the fixed-difference system of the New York Cotton Exchange has tended to attract mainly the surplus grades of cotton to that market, the further complaint is made that this stock has been used by large operators in connection with the fixed-difference system to systematically hammer the New York contract price. It has already been shown that the effect of differences which overvalue certain grades of cotton when delivered on contract is to depress the contract price. A striking illustration of this occurred in the New York market in November, 1906. It is charged that such sacrifices of contracts as took place at that time has occurred again and again on a smaller scale in the New York market as a result of improper difference in connection with an undesirable stock of deliverable cotton. The argument is that because the New York contract differences frequently overvalue certain grades, and because deliveries of cotton are usually so mixed as to be undesirable to the receiver, holders of contracts, even though they were aware of these conditions at the time they bought such contracts, nevertheless, when the date of delivery actually arrives, are unwilling to take up the cotton, but instead "run from notices"; that is, sell out their contracts when they receive notice of delivery from the seller.
> The charge here outlined is substantially that large spot houses on the New York Cotton Exchange have taken advantage of the general character of the New York stock and of the artificial differences established by the New York Cotton Exchange to "milk" the market by tendering undesirable deliveries at false differences, thus inducing the buyers of such contracts to sell them out at a sacrifice. In this case it is alleged these same spot interests have purchased these contracts at the decline, thus making a profitable turn. It is alleged that spot merchants in the New York market have thus been able to keep in their possession a stock of cotton and to use it over and over again as a very effective weapon for clubbing the New York contract market.

Now, is that true? If that is true, will anyone say it is not a grievous wrong? Do I offer it as my ipse dixit? Why, no; I offer it as defined by Mr. Smith in this report. But suppose my friend here says he will not accept that?

Mr. MANDELBAUM. I do not want to say that, but I say, Did you yourself not find some fault with some of his conclusions?

Mr. BURLESON. I find fault with his conclusions. I agree with Mr. Marsh that the burden of marketing the crop does not fall on the speculator, but is borne by the producer and the consumer. I agree with Mr. Marsh on that, and not with Mr. Smith. I accord to Mr. Smith honesty in the conclusion that he reached, but I do not agree with him; just as Mr. Mandelbaum and I do not agree about many things. It is the viewpoint. But suppose there is somebody here who says, "Well, I will not take this disinterested Government official; I decline to accept his statement." Then let me read you this:

> In this connection one of the largest spot merchants in the New York market, who is also a member of the exchange, said——

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Who said?

Mr. BURLESON. Who is the member? Gentlemen, that is one of the mysteries I am unable to fathom. I receive letters from the members of the exchange denouncing the nefarious practices that they say exist there, and yet they are unwilling to come forward and speak before this committee. I could have explained about the yellow paper, but I will not, because I am not authorized to do so.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. But it is evidently somebody that Mr. Smith thinks worthy of being quoted.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; and who, Mr. Smith says, is a large spot dealer and a member of the exchange.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. Or he would not have quoted him.

Mr. BURLESON. I so understand it.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. Let us see what he says.

Mr. BURLESON. Unless Mr. Smith is a liar, he is a large spot dealer and a member of the exchange. Are you not willing to take out of the mouths of these people themselves what they say about it; when the spinners themselves come here pleading that they be relieved of this great burden that has been placed upon them? He says:

> In this connection one of the largest spot merchants in the New York market, who is also a member of the exchange, said: "There is no question but that there is a large amount of that (i. e., inferior cotton) here. These men who get control of a lot of contracts and want to weaken the market—that is, the spot brokers."

That is, the spot brokers want to weaken the market; these large spot dealers, nine of them, on the revision committee, who want to weaken the market before they buy—ought such power to rest with men who are buying the product of a helpless people, to weaken the market price and then buy? I want some man with a conscience to answer that question. Should this be permitted? Hear the further reading from this member of the exchange:

> These men, who get control of a lot of contracts and want to weaken the market—that is, the spot brokers—do not want to handle and finance actual cotton. They will throw a lot of this stuff over which they have got to transfer to a different month or themselves finance it. This has been acting as a club, and I think it is one of the worst features of the exchange. A combination will get together a lot of this low-grade cotton, and before notice day there would be a high market and they would throw it right on the market, and of course it would force the market down—sometimes a half a cent.

Q. And then they take back their contracts?—A. Yes; and very often at a lower price and thereby make what is called a "turn." They might have sold short and they throw this low cotton on the market and lower the price a half a cent and then buy it in again.

Q. Has that been an extensive practice?—A. Right along.

Q. So that the same cotton has been sold again in this way a great many times?—A. Without question.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me interrupt you there to make a suggestion.

Mr. BURLESON. With pleasure.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the committee is quite willing to agree to a proposition which nobody would deny, that with fixed differences which did not represent actual commercial relations between grades, manipulation might be possible under which the market could be unfairly depressed or advanced.

Mr. BURLESON. It is undeniably true.

The CHAIRMAN. And the emphasis which you have laid upon the proposition I think might perhaps fairly warrant the conclusion that if this one wrong practice could be remedied, you might have no objection to the exchange?

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, no; there are many others.

The CHAIRMAN. And I think before you close it would a good idea for you to bring up other reasons, if you have any other reasons.

Mr. BURLESON. I have. I think this is the most indefensible practice of the exchange under their rules. And I contend it can not correct it; that is the point I make. The New York Exchange can not abandon this system of fixed differences, because if it did it could not draw cotton to New York upon which to bank as a reserve; it must have a certain amount of actual cotton in New York or it can not operate. It can not draw this cotton there if it abandons its practice of overvaluing certain grades. That is the point that I make, and it can not be gotten away from.

Mr. BEALL. Bearing on the question of this quotation that Mr. BURLESON has just read, I notice that it is in the form of question and answer. This statement must have been made in some investigation.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes, sir; in an investigation by Mr. Herbert Knox Smith, and he put the questions and answers in this report so that you could get exactly at the meaning of the member of the exchange who was speaking.

The CHAIRMAN. Were the witnesses under oath?

Mr. BURLESON. I do not know whether they were or not; but they are a lot of reputable merchants who, when the suggestion was made that there might be transactions through the exchange where there was no expectation of delivery or receipt of the actual cotton, became much offended. Now I will proceed to other matters, although I have not exhausted this subject of fixed differences.

Mr. LEVER. I would like you, before you get away from that point, to answer this question: Why is it necessary to keep a reserve of cotton in New York?

Mr. BURLESON. Because they are bound to have a certain amount of cotton there to tender on these future contracts if the cotton should be demanded. And now, right on that point, how many bales on contracts are demanded? I want to be perfectly fair to the exchange about it; I want to take what they say about it themselves. On page 264 we find table No. 23, which is headed "Total tenders of cotton on contract in New York and contract deliveries in New Orleans, crop years 1892–93 to 1906–7." These are the last data that I have on the subject at hand. This was in the year 1906–7, the year that we raised the 14,000,000-bale crop, the big crop; and when Mr. Neville was before you the question was asked how many bales were annually delivered on contract, and he said about 500,000. That does not mean 500,000 bales of cotton. Oh, no! I read from page 264 of the Smith report:

It may be noted that these large tenders of cotton at New York unquestionably mean that a considerable amount of cotton was retendered again and again, since for several years the total tenders at New York have greatly exceeded the total amount of cotton certificated by the inspection bureau of the New York Cotton Exchange.

Now, out of their own establishment comes this information, and surely they can not be heard to deny it.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Can you not include New Orleans, too?

Mr. BURLESON. New Orleans is pitiful.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. That is a spot market. I want you to read that, too.

Mr. BURLESON. The New Orleans spot market is one thing, and the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, dealing in future contracts, is quite another. I hold no brief for the defense of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange. If it can not exist under the operation of the Scott bill, let it go out of business, and I hope it will.

Now, how many bales are handled on the New York Cotton Exchange on these contracts? That is an interesting question. We have had some difficulty in getting these figures. I want to show you, and I think I can, to your satisfaction, approximately how many there were.

Mr. BEALL. This number that you have read is the number tendered, not the number delivered?

Mr. BURLESON. No, sir.

Mr. BEALL. Then, although the same bale might be delivered over and over, this is the total number tendered.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Delivered.

Mr. BEALL. Well, is it?

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Yes.

Mr. BEALL. It does not mean actual delivery.

Mr. BURLESON. I will read this which is handed to me by Mr. BEALL, which is particularly appropos:

It should be emphasized that the figures given for the New York Exchange are not necessarily actual deliveries of cotton on contract but the total of notices of delivery; in other words, the total does not mean that there was an actual transfer of ownership of cotton to the extent of the figures given.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. That is absolutely wrong. I will state that under oath.

Mr. BURLESON. I am perfectly willing to take it as Mr. Mandelbaum wants it.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no controversy over the proposition that an enormously greater number of bales are dealt in than are actually delivered. There is no question about that.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. There is no question about that. We have had Mr. Hubbard, Mr. Neville, Mr. Mandelbaum, and Mr. Marsh before the committee, and we have struggled to find out how many bales are bought and sold, and I want to say in that connection that every future transaction on the New York Exchange exercises its influence ultimately upon the market price of cotton. I lay down that proposition and do not think it can be refuted. The particular influence exerted by an isolated transaction may be imperceptible, but ultimately this transaction enters into an aggregate which finally either depresses the price or raises it. There can be no question about that. The question is how many of these transactions take place.

Mr. COCKS. What would be the objection to that from an economic point of view?

Mr. BURLESON. It does not make any difference whether we object to it or not. It is a law of trade.

Mr. COCKS. Whom does it hurt? That is what I mean.

Mr. BURLESON. If, under the rules and operations of the principal exchange, where these future contracts are dealt in, it exercises a depressing influence upon the market price of spot cotton it hurts the producer. If it has the reverse result it hurts the spinner. Speaking for the producer, I want to say that he does not desire an abnormal price, an unnatural price, or an artificial price for his cotton. All he wants is the price fixed by the legitimate law of supply and demand.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. One question, Mr. BURLESON. According to your explanation that you have given us, we depress the price if we deliver cotton and we do something wrong when we do not deliver it Now, will you kindly point out what we should do?

Mr. BURLESON. Abandon your present practices.

Mr. BEALL. Turn from the evil of your ways.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; turn from the evil of your ways. But, Mr. Chairman, we are trying to get at how many bales of this spook cotton are annually bought and sold. I want to distinguish between the phantom cotton and the bales tendered on contracts, and I will approximately arrive at the truth. Of course, it rests with these gentlemen alone to tell us the real facts. They say they can not do it. Consequently, we must enter upon a process of reasoning and get at the facts as best we can. We knew these annual sales until they adopted the fixed-difference system in 1897, but since then we do not know; but when that practice was adopted, undoubtedly, as admitted by everybody, it greatly stimulated speculation in cotton. Now, how many bales were bought and sold the last year of which we have the record? But I will not take the last year. The last year was not satisfactory to them, and that was the reason they adopted the fixed-difference system; consequently, it is not fair to take the last year. I am going to take the year before the last, and use figures the exchange itself has furnished.

Mr. SIMS. By "the last year" you mean——

Mr. BURLESON. The last year before the New York Exchange adopted the fixed-difference system, in 1896. In 1896 there was a total crop of 7,140,000 bales. That year, according to their own admissions, they sold, for future delivery on the New York Cotton Exchange, 56,469,000 bales, with a crop of 7,140,000. The total crop in 1906, speaking in round numbers, was practically doubled, or 14,000,000 bales. Remember that the adoption of the fixed-difference system greatly stimulated speculation. At the lowest, allowing for no increase of speculation, we have 100,000,000 bales of future contracts bought and sold on the exchange for that year. Am I not fairly justified in this estimate? Mr. Marsh was asked what was an ordinary day's transactions on the exchange. He said 350,000 bales.

Mr. BEALL. He said, in answer to Mr. LEVER's question, that that would be a normal day's transactions.

Mr. BURLESON. Three hundred and fifty thousand bales in one day. What would be an active day, he was asked. He said 1,000,000 bales would be an active day. Now, gentlemen, are we justified in this estimate? Are we not moderate when we fix its annual sales and purchases at 100,000,000 bales? Knock off 10,000,000 and say it is 90,000,000 bales.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask you a question there right on that line?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask you if, upon the average, the entire certificated stock in New York is not sold, in and out, every day of the year?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; it usually has about 130,000 bales in its warehouses—an ordinary day's sales is about 350,000 bales.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me suggest again that that is not the controverted point, and let us not spend any more time on it. It is 5 o'clock already. How soon can you complete your speech?

Mr. BURLESON. I have no set speech.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. I thought you were only going to speak for 30 minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. You stated that we had difficulty in finding out the number of bales bought and sold on the New York Cotton Exchange. I think that you want to be fair. They were very candid in giving that information.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; I said they could not give the aggregate. I did not understand either one of them to give an aggregate. If he did, I beg his pardon.

Mr. HAUGEN. His statement was corroborated by the statement of Mr. LEVER.

Mr. BURLESON. I am accepting his statement as to a normal day's trade, and I have based my calculation on it.

Mr. HAUGEN. I rather inferred from what you said that this information had been furnished reluctantly.

Mr. BURLESON. I say we have had some difficulty in getting at the annual sales. We have not gotten it at all. They have not given it to us. I will not assign any reason for their failure to do so. Now, how many bales of cotton were hedged during the year? How many is it possible for them to have hedged? Let us take the 90,000,000 bales of futures, how many of this number was it possible for them to have hedged? We spun in this country about 6,000,000 bales of cotton. We all know, Mr. McCALL says that thousands of spinners do not hedge at all. But for argument's sake, take every single bale that was used here, and eliminate the Liverpool Exchange and eliminate the New Orleans Exchange, and say that it was all hedged in New York, this whole 6,000,000 bales that was consumed here in the United States, that would give us only 12,000,000 bales hedged, 6,000,000 bales bought and 6,000,000 bales sold. Now take the 12,000,000 bales of hedges from 90,000,000 bales of futures dealt in and it leaves 78,000,000 bales of phantom cotton dealt in. Now, can this conclusion be escaped? If so, I would like the error to be pointed out by some one right now.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. Without expressing an opinion, suppose it was to be conceded that a very large part of the transactions on that exchange were speculations, that they were dealing in phantom cotton, that their transactions were merely a bet as to what quotations would be at a future day, just as we might bet on what the temperature would be on the 1st day of next July. What do you say to the proposition that the cotton exchange is necessary and does good as a protection to the producer and to the consumer of cotton, because the prices prevailing do bear some relation to the actual value as it might be determined by the supply and demand, and is practically the only means that the producer has of learning the prices and that he would be at the mercy of the spinner, and so on, if there were no such system; that the cotton exchange really serves a good purpose? Suppose it to be conceded that all you speak of is true, what do you say as to the good that is claimed for it?

Mr. BURLESON. The only justification that they claim for it themselves is the protection it affords as a place for hedging, and I contend that according to their own figures, with the fluctuations that constantly take place and the wide margins that exist between the price of futures and the price of spots, that it really affords no hedge.

The CHAIRMAN. It appears that you will not be able to answer that question to-night.

Mr. BURLESON. It will take quite an elaborate discussion to do that; but there is one other phase that I would like to present, and then I will stop.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. One question about that phantom cotton. Suppose I sell a horse to Mr. LEVER, and he sells it to the next gentleman, and the next gentleman sells it to the chairman, and the chairman sells it to Mr. Cocks. Are four of those horses phantom horses? [Laughter.]

Mr. BURLESON. No; and I would not so claim.

Mr. NEIL. The committee has given the other side a good deal of time on this proposition, and, if it is not trespassing upon the committee too much, I would ask that Mr. BURLESON have time to-morrow to conclude his speech.

Mr. BURLESON. I realize, Mr. Chairman, that the date set for hearing the representatives of the grain exchanges is to-morrow, but I want to discuss the hedging facilities of the New York Cotton Exchange, and I do not believe I can do it at this late hour with fairness to the committee or myself.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe the committee would like to have Mr. BURLESON answer the question which has just been asked him. It is very true that we have heard the gentlemen representing the cotton exchange for the last five or six days, but it is only fair to state that the time has been pretty evenly divided, because they were engaged in answering questions which the members of the committee asked for the purpose of eliciting information, so that I think the time has been fairly divided, so far as that is concerned. But that is not the question. What the committee desires is to get information, no matter from whom it comes, and if there is not objection, I think it might be understood that Mr. BURLESON will have some time to-morrow morning.

Mr. BURLESON. If you will give me 20 minutes without interruption, I can finish what I have to present.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose we have it understood that he shall have 30 minutes in the morning to conclude his remarks, and at the conclusion of his remarks there are a few questions that I desire to ask Mr. Marsh or some other gentleman, and perhaps other members of the committee will have questions they would like to ask, so that on the whole we will extend this hearing for an hour, and take that much time off the time of the grain men to-morrow morning.

Mr. BURLESON. Will you permit me to present one further matter at this time? It will take only a few minutes to do so.

Mr. Mandelbaum asked about phantom horses, and did it hurt anybody? Let us see whether such transactions hurt anybody. What are the effects of these transactions? Have I not read of the effects of manipulation by large spot buyers, members of the cotton exchange, who are also members of the revision committee? Have I not shown that they can hammer prices of futures down? If I have, then we are face to face with the question, Does the price of futures control the price of spots, or does the price of spots control the futures? as these gentlemen have so very earnestly contended here. I can show you in Commissioner Smith's report where the statement is made that the prices of spots, if not controlled by futures, are largely influenced. This report says on this subject:

> A fact of great importance in this discussion is that the prices paid by cotton merchants for a large part of the cotton crop are based directly upon the future quotations of some cotton exchange. It is imperative that this be kept clearly in mind. Such merchants send their buying agents directly to the large plantations, or to the small country towns where cotton is brought in from farms in wagonloads of a few bales each. Instead of instructing these agents to pay a flat price for cotton, such merchants usually direct them to make their purchases within a certain number of points "on" or "off" (above or below) some cotton-exchange quotations of futures. These points on or off are known as "limits."

I am not going to ask you to accept this statement. You heard Mr. Parker say that instruction coming from New York merchants, large spot operators, to buy spot cotton was usually to buy it, so many points on or off futures. I will not ask you to accept his statement. You heard Mr. Lathrop, in reply to a question, state that frequently orders came to him, "buy spot cotton, so many points on or off futures." I will not ask you to take his testimony. I think, however, I have the right to ask your acceptance of the testimony I now offer. One of the ablest and most earnest defenders of the New York exchange, who was in the thick of the fray at the time of the Hatch and the George bills, was the firm Latham, Alexander & Co. Mr. Latham and Mr. Alexander are both dead, but the firm is still conducted.

Mr. NEVILLE. No; it is not.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, if it is not conducted, there is some member of your exchange operating under their name.

The CHAIRMAN. That is an immaterial matter.

Mr. BURLESON. It is immaterial, for I hold in my hand a pamphlet defending the New York Exchange, which was mailed from one end of this country to the other last year, containing a discussion of this matter and prepared by Latham, Alexander & Co. This was issued and bears date March 16, 1908.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Latham has only recently died.

Mr. BURLESON. I do not know when he died, but he was a member of the exchange at the time this statement was issued. He was put forward to attack these bills, and when speeches were made two years ago attacking the exchanges the first document received by Members of Congress in defense of the New York Cotton Exchange was issued by Latham, Alexander & Co. I read from this defense of the exchange by one of its members:

If there were other exchanges throughout the United States dealing in cotton for future delivery, they would have to look to the controlling market, which is New York, for quotations.

That shows, first, just what I have contended all the time, that the New Orleans Cotton Exchange is completely overshadowed by the colossal New York affair, that it merely trails along in the wake of the New York concern. Now, let us see what else he says:

The price of cotton contracts—

Not spot cotton—but the price of cotton contracts, futures—

in New York oftentimes controls the price of cotton in the whole world, because this city is presumed to know more about the supply than any other, and our operations and dealings are therefore generally followed.

There you have it—the price of futures oftentimes controls the price of spot cotton throughout the world.

The issue is fairly raised, and bearing on it Mr. Parker tells you that futures exercise a controlling influence on spot, that merchants in the South buy spots so many points on or off futures. Mr. Latham says that that is frequently the practice. Commissioner Smith, in his report, says that futures exercise a psychological influence over—does not control absolutely but exercises great influence over—the price of spot cotton, and last we have Latham, Alexander & Co. in this defense of the New York Cotton Exchange, admitting that futures control the price of spots and not spots the price of futures.

Now, gentlemen, I am going to testify myself. Not once, not twice, but many times has this happened. I sell cotton in Waco, Tex., where I believe Mr. Neville has an agent. That is my market place. I do not sell it myself. The man who manages the plantation and is associated with me sells it. I have stood by his shoulder dozens of times and heard him ask the cotton buyer over the phone, "What will you give for cotton this morning?" The answer would be, "I can not make you an offer, because I have not heard from New York."

Mr. COCKS. Would not they make any price?

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, yes; but he knew that we are not fools; that we wanted approximately what the cotton was worth.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. You wanted what the cotton was worth?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; we wanted the highest price we could get.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. You did not want to sell it for nothing?

Mr. COCKS. It seems to me that would apply to everything on earth.

Mr. BURLESON. Then you admit, you concede the proposition that futures control the price of spots?

Mr. MANDELBAUM. So far as you are concerned; yes. You would not sell before you got that quotation.

Mr. COCKS. That is evidently true, so far as you are concerned.

Mr. BURLESON. Not once, not twice, but hundreds of times has that happened, and my practice is not different from others. The cotton buyers would say, "We can not give you the price, because we have not heard from the market": and then when this information would come, we would frequently be told "If you had called us up yesterday, we could have given you so many points more than we can this morning, because the market has declined to that extent."

Mr. COCKS. Would not that have been a stand-off, then? What is the difference? If you had sold yesterday, somebody else would have been out.

Mr. BURLESON. It sometimes was a stand-off to the extent of $2 a bale to me—$2 less, because futures in New York had declined.

Mr. COCKS. But if you had sold yesterday, you would have made $2 a bale.

Mr. HOWELL. What is to hinder you from taking out contracts with the actual consumer—the mill?

Mr. BURLESON. The trade conditions do not permit it.

Mr. HOWELL. Upon the actual demand?

Mr. BURLESON. The bulk of the cotton crop is made by small producers. There are very, very few men who make 100 bales of cotton, and mill owners buy in 100 or 500 bale lots. My colleague, Mr. BEALL, represents, as I said a moment ago, the largest cotton-producing county in the world. I should like Mr. BEALL to state approximately what per cent of farmers in his county make 100 bales of cotton.

Mr. BEALL. I should say not over 5 per cent; perhaps not more than 2 per cent.

Mr. HOWELL. You failed to state, when you said that you wanted to hear the price of cotton in New York, at Waco, that it was the price of futures.

Mr. BURLESON. Of course, that cotton buyer had instructions to buy within certain limits—so many points off or on the future price.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. You wanted to sell, did you not, and you would not sell until you got that price?

Mr. BURLESON. I wanted to sell and I wanted to get the best price I could. I must confess my profound astonishment when I heard even an attempt at denial of the proposition, not that futures absolutely controlled spots (because they do not), but that they exercise a controlling influence over the price of spots; and no candid, fair-minded man ought to deny it.

Mr. BEALL. On what was that bid on your cotton based?

Mr. BURLESON. It was based upon the price of future contracts in New York. There is no doubt about it that large spot dealers in New York and elsewhere send out instructions. I am able to state it. I have seen such instructions time and time again—instructions to buy cotton at so many points on or off futures.

Mr. COCKS. Suppose we admit that; I understand that. That is simple and plain. What I can not understand is how you are hurt any. Suppose spots are the basis, how are you hurt?

Mr. BURLESON. Under the operation of the rules of the New York Cotton Exchange one large operator on the exchange can depress the price of futures. I think I have shown it here. If I have not shown that, then I do not think that any proposition is susceptible of demonstration. I have shown it by Commissioner Smith's report, by spinners, by cotton merchants, and by the confessions of the members of the exchange.

Mr. COCKS. Probably you have, but my mental capacity has not been able to grasp it thoroughly. It seems to me you are only on all fours with the man who has a carload of cattle and he calls up on the telephone and wants to know what the market is, and he ships to Kansas City and the market has dropped 2 or 3 cents while the cattle are on the way, and he loses that much. What is the difference?

Mr. BURLESON. One is operating in the actual cattle, and the price is offered for actual cattle by the man who is going to buy these cattle from him. In the other case the man who is selling the cotton is compelled to take a price for his spot cotton, for his actual cotton, that is influenced by the price of a future contract which has been fixed in New York, which has been manipulated, which may have been hammered down by the very man offering to buy the spot cotton.

Mr. COCKS. The shipper of the cattle believes that the price of his cattle is fixed by the beef trust.

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, well. I think there is no analogy between the two cases.

Mr. COCKS. I wanted to know what you think would happen if you had not a cotton exchange?

Mr. BURLESON. Then prices would be regulated by the law of supply and demand.

Mr. COCKS. Why does not the law of supply and demand regulate it now?

Mr. BURLESON. Because of these unnatural conditions which are brought about under the rules of the cotton exchanges dealing in futures.

Mr. COCKS. Why does not the same thing happen in regard to cattle?

Mr. BURLESON. Because they have no exchange on which cattle can be gambled in, as they gamble in cotton.

Mr. COCKS. But the trust affects that in the same way. Would it not be possible for the same tihing to exist in the cotton market?

Mr. BURLESON. There is a different economic principle involved there, entirely. With the permission of the chairman, I will now suspend until to-morrow morning.

(At 5.30 o'clock p. m., the committee adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 18, 1910, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.)

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE,
Friday, February 18, 1910.

The committee met at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Hon. Charles F. Scott (chairman) presiding.

The CHAIRMAN. It was the expectation of the committee to take up this morning that phase of the pending bills relating particularly to the grain exchanges, and it is still our expectation to do that before the morning expires. But Representative Burleson, of Texas, who was addressing the committee yesterday, was unable to finish within the time allowed and it was agreed, before adjournment on yesterday, that he should proceed this morning for 30 minutes, and in order that he may have all of that time in which to present the matters which he regards of importance, the Chair will ask that he be not interrupted until he has concluded his statement. I will ask Mr. Burleson to proceed. He is to be called down in 30 minutes.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee. It is my purpose to confine myself this morning, in the main, to a discussion of two phases of the question now before you. First, as to the necessity for the existence of these exchanges for hedging purposes; second, what will be the result upon the cotton trade if we eliminate the speculative feature from these exchanges. But before I enter upon a discussion of those two questions, just for a minute or two, I want to answer one or two questions that were asked me yesterday, which, by reason of interruptions and diversions, I did not answer. One question was asked by the gentleman from Iowa Mr. HAUGEN, and it was with reference to whether cotton carried in the reserve stock at New York was spinable or useable cotton, and if so, when one purchased that cotton where was the serious hurt to him?

Now, gentlemen, just in a word that can be answered. It has been shown here that during the entire period of the crop season of 1906 and 1907, and at frequent intervals since that time, there has been a lack of parity between the price of future contracts and spot cotton amounting sometimes from 80 to 196 points. This means from $4 to $10 a bale less for futures on the New York Cotton Exchange than the market price for spot cotton in the South. Now, if it were practicable for spinners of the East to go to New York and secure the actual cotton on these contracts wouldn't they jump at the chance to save that $4 to $10 a bale and, in addition, the freight charge from the South, which they could do if by going there they could get the cotton they want? Why, you know they would. And yet they do not do it because it is unsafe and dangerous for them to attempt an acceptance of the cotton tenderable on contract. Take the case of Representative Lovering, who recently died, who, with his brother, spun 200,000 bales a year; think a moment what a saving it would have been to him if he could have gone to New York and bought his cotton through the New York Cotton Exchange; by saving $4 a bale his savings would reach $800,000 or more each year, an amount probably greater than his entire profits for the year. I think this answers the question of the gentleman from Iowa. Representative Cocks of New York also said that he could not understand why, if there was an overvaluation of the high grades deliverable on the future contract, and the prices of spots were being influenced by reason of that overvaluation of the high grades, it would not be beneficial to the people of the South or the producers of cotton rather than hurtful to them. It should be kept in mind that the grades overvalued are deliverable by the seller, and the buyer if he accepts delivery must take these grades on the basis of their overvaluation.

Now, gentlemen, I can illustrate the effect of this. I went by Woodward & Lothrop's this morning and bought some cotton goods. A spinner is controlled in the character of cotton he buys by the use he intends to put it to; by the character of cotton goods he intends to manufacture. I hold in my hand two samples of cotton goods made from the very lowest grades of cotton, one worth 4 cents a yard, the other, I think, worth about 10 or 12 cents a yard [exhibiting pieces of cloth]. These goods are made from the low grades of cotton; the spinners who make this character of stuff do not want the higher grades of cotton. It would be a useless expense to them to purchase the higher grades and use them. Now, suppose a spinner wanted low-grade cotton and the high grades of cotton had been overvalued by the revision committee of the New York Cotton Exchange, and he demanded delivery on a future contract—and, as Mr. Parker says, and as other spinners have said to you, the seller has the option and always gives you what you do not want—and they should give to this spinner who uses a low grade of cotton for the purpose of making this cheap cloth—they can manufacture a suit of clothes out of such cotton for a dollar and a half, an entire suit of clothes—and they tender to this spinner who manufactures this sort of material, the highest grade of cotton, which costs from $8 to $10 a bale more than the cotton which enters into the manufacture of this cheap cloth, he would promptly refuse to accept delivery and sell his contract at a loss. Can not you see how dangerous it would be for him to go to the exchange for the purpose of acquiring his stock of cotton, because if he acquired high-grade cotton to manufacture into this character of stuff he would suffer a great loss. If he accepts delivery, it might cost him $10 a bale more than he would pay if he bought the kind of cotton suitable for his purpose, and consequently he runs away from the notice of delivery; he promptly sells out his contract.

Keep in mind at all times this proposition, that one can not buy a future contract and expect to receive delivery of a particular grade of cotton. The contract sold is a basis contract, and the seller may deliver 15 or 20 or even 28 different grades of cotton on it, and one may expect an excess of the particular grades he can not use and does not want. A spinner who manufactures this cloth [exhibiting same], a fine grade of cotton cloth, could not use the grade of cotton used to make this cheap cloth. An entire suit of clothes out of this cheap cloth can be bought for $1.50, whereas the cloth (8 yards) for a woman's suit from this material would cost $16.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Do you think you could make a suit out of that cloth for $1.50?

Mr. BURLESON. I bought a coat and pair of trousers for $1.50, in order to use while fishing, and they were made of this cheap material. Now, suppose a spinner who manufactures this kind of goods, the finest cotton cloth [exhibiting piece of goods to committee], bought a future contract and there should happen to be a cotton crop that was low in grade for the year, and he should go to the New York Cotton Exchange and demand delivery under his contract and should be tendered and receive the kind of cotton that goes into the manufacture of this cheapest of cotton goods [exhibiting cloth to committee], can not you see that it would be as worthless to him as wheat and straw? It would represent, especially if it were overvalued, as it always is when the crop is of low grade, as I showed you on yesterday, nearly a total loss to him. Thus you see that the tender of high grades may be ruinous to one spinner and the tender of low grades ruinous to another.

Yesterday Mr. Mandelbaum propounded a query to me. When I was discussing "spook" cotton, he asked, "If A sells a horse to B, and B sells the same horse to C, and C to D and D to E and E to F, would four of these horses be 'spook' horses?" Do you recall that when Mr. Marsh was addressing the committee he said the intricacies of the transactions upon the New York Exchange were such that it was difficult for the lay mind to comprehend them? I realize that the complexities of these exchange transactions might confuse some people, but I did not think they were such that even Mr. Mandelbaum would fail to comprehend them. Mr. Chairman, the horse illustration is not the character of transaction that takes place on the New York Cotton Exchange; they do not there sell a hundred bales of cotton to A and A to B and so on; they sell a future contract for the delivery of cotton, a different proposition altogether, a contract, and a basis contract at that, for the delivery of cotton. Now, I will also use a horse illustration of the exchange type.

Suppose a man who had a horse to sell heard that there was a horse exchange in the town and should carry his horse to the exchange to dispose of him. Arriving there he finds that on this exchange they are not selling horses, but future contracts for the delivery of horses, and that these transactions were going to control the price he was to receive for his horse. Suppose he should see a future contract for the delivery of a horse sold for a given price, then another future contract for a horse at a lower price, and then another at a higher price, and somebody standing by, a member of the exchange, should say to him as these contracts were being sold and bought, "Now, the price of your horse has gone down; now it has gone up." And if you asked why, should answer, "Because these sale contracts for the delivery of horses that are taking place, actual contracts, where there is an expectation that delivery will take place, indicate the market value of your horse, in fact will control the price you are to receive for him." When he saw these transactions going on and on and on would it be surprising if he finally asked, "Where are all these horses? I don't see any horses that are being traded in under these contracts; where are the horses? I have seen dozens of sales, I have seen hundreds of contracts for horses sold, but I have not seen a horse." Would you blame him if he reached the conclusion that they were phantom horses that were being dealt in? Why, of course, you would not. Neither would you blame him if he objected to having the market price of his horse influenced or controlled by these transactions.

My friend Mr. Mandelbaum has become so involved in the complexities of the situation that he loses sight of the real transactions which take place on the cotton exchange. Keep in mind the fact that it is future contracts for the delivery of cotton that are being bought and sold on this exchange and not real cotton that is there being bought and sold. Remember, also, that these future contracts for the delivery of cotton are controlled by the law of supply and demand, just exactly as cotton is controlled by the law of supply and demand. If there is an excess of offers of the future contracts for the delivery of cotton, the price of contracts or futures goes down; if there is a scarcity of offers of contracts, then the price of futures goes up. By an excess of offers to sell contracts a combination may force a decline in futures at its will.

I address myself now to the hedging proposition. Mr. Chairman, the chief defense made, or the principal justification for the continued existence of the New York Cotton Exchange, is that it affords a protection to the spinner or a protection to the cotton merchant who sells the spinner his raw material when goods are being sold in advance of their manufacture by the spinner.

Now, what is it that makes a safe hedge? It has been made plain to you that where violent fluctuation takes place in the price of futures and the parity between the price of futures and the price of spots is not maintained, that when the margin becomes too wide, an attempt at hedging becomes an added risk rather than a protection. For a future contract to be a protection as a hedge there must be maintained a certain parity, a uniform parity, between the price of futures and the price of spots. Now, is this parity being maintained, or has it been for years, so as to afford a safe hedge? Let me read from Commissioner Smith's report, page 155, Volume I:

From the table it will be seen that in the period from 1880 to 1888, during which the commercial-difference principle was employed by the New York Cotton Exchange, fluctuations in the margin between the price of spot cotton and the price of futures were confined to moderate limits. It was reasonably safe, then, during that period, for the merchant or spinner to go to the New York Cotton Exchange for the purpose of buying a contract hedge to relieve himself of the risk.

Now, it was about this time that the through bill of lading came into use, and the exchange changed its practice of fixing differences, and what happened? I read further from the report:

In 1888 the New York Cotton Exchange, as already stated, abandoned its policy of frequent revisions and provided that its revision committee should meet only nine times a year (or monthly from September to April and again in June).

That was once a month during the active cotton season. Now, note the immediate effect of that change upon the price of contracts. I read further from Commissioner Smith's report:

It is worth noting that this change was almost immediately accompanied by a marked disturbance of the parity between the spot and the contract price.

They were making revisions of differences during that time once a month, nine times during the season, and conditions were growing worse. Finally New York ceased to be a spot-cotton market, and in 1897 the exchange abandoned the practice of fixing these differences once a month during the active cotton season and entered upon the policy of fixing the differences once a year. When first organized and until 1888 differences in value between grades were, by the rules of the exchange, fixed daily—kept in line with commercial differences—and the parity between the price of futures and spots was closely maintained. In 1888 the exchange changed its rules and differences were fixed once a month, being at such times brought in line with the commercial differences. This change brought about a marked disturbance of the parity between spots and futures. This practice continued until 1897, when again the exchange changed its rules and entered upon the policy of fixing differences practically only once a year, and that, too, at a time when the character of the crop could not possibly be known. The result could not be other than it is—the parity between the prices of future and spots has, for commercial purposes, been completely destroyed.

Speaking of this last change, Commissioner Smith in his report had this to say:

In the same year, 1897, the New York Cotton Exchange abandoned monthly meetings and provided that it should meet only twice a year, namely, in September and November, and this system has been in force ever since. This change has been followed by a very marked change in the relationship between the spot and the contract price. Since that period what has been the common result, or the continuous result, if I may so express it, of this system of fixed differences?

I will read you further from this report:

From September, 1899, down to the present time, however, the margin has, on the whole, been very much greater than in earlier years, and, what is far more important, it has fluctuated with much greater violence.

If this margin was maintained at a parity, even if it was slightly out of line with the commercial value of cotton—spot cotton in the South—merchants and spinners could take that into account, make allowance for it and protect themselves; but, gentlemen, when cotton fluctuates in this wise—I read from their own statistics for 1907:

Taking each month as I call them, from the time deliveries for that month were dealt in until the close of that month, the price fluctuated as follows: For September, from 11.18 cents per pound to 8.58. Remember, now, that this price is for the same grade of cotton. For October, from 11.30 cents to 8.69 cents per pound; November, from 11.70 to 8.85; December, 11.30 to 8.90; January, 11.31 to 8.99; February, 11.40 to 9.06; March, 11.48 to 9.02; and thus throughout the year, for July the highest being 13 cents and the lowest 9.35 cents per pound. Thus you see that these prices are either manipulated or the unrestrained speculation keeps the market price shifting round like a howling dervish.

Frequently since then, during certain months, futures have fluctuated violently, as much as 3 cents within a very short period. Recently the price of future contracts has fluctuated as much as 3 cents a pound in the month, and nearly always there is a fluctuation of from 2 to 3 cents in any future month for the delivery of cotton. When these violent fluctuations take place, pray tell me what becomes of this margin of safety which affords protection to merchant and spinner? Where is it found? As a matter of fact it is often so wide there is frequently such a variance between the price of future contracts and the price of spots that no merchant and no spinner can, with safety, rely upon it as a hedge. It has ceased to be a protection either to the merchant or to the spinner, as was asserted here by Mr. Parker, and has, as a matter of fact, become an additional menace and danger. Now, let us see what Commissioner Smith says on that point. Page 157, speaking of this irregularity in the margin, he says: "This means that merchants using the market for hedging purposes have been more or less constantly subjected to a very serious risk."

What is the purpose of hedging? The purpose of hedging is to avoid risk, to escape the dangers occasioned by fluctuation in the price of cotton. And, by the way, I will say here that, in my deliberate judgment, these dangers, these fluctuations in prices are directly attributable to the operations of these exchanges. They bring about the very condition which makes it necessary for the merchant and the spinner to fly to them in a vain effort to protect themselves by hedging. A careful reading of this report will drive conviction home to the mind of any candid man that fluctuations in the price of futures are directly attributable to the "subsidiary element" operating on the New York Cotton Exchange; that it is these violent fluctuations of from 2 to 3 cents a pound in the price of futures in each and every month that makes it necessary for the cotton spinner and the cotton merchant to seek protection for themselves against it. Eliminate this danger by prohibiting these gambling contracts—and that is the sole purpose of the Scott bill—and you make it impossible for these violent fluctuations to be brought about. I did not read all that Commissioner Smith said on this subject.

Whereas, as so frequently emphasized, the purpose of hedging is to reduce or eliminate risk. It means, too, that the calculations of speculators as to the movements of the contract price itself have been rendered more difficult and risks consequently increased.

Thus it is made plain that instead of hedging facilities being afforded, the New York Cotton Exchange or any other exchange, where the margin between the price of future contracts and the price of spots is constantly disturbed and becomes so wide as to destroy the parity between them, instead of affording relief to the spinner or affording a safeguard for the merchant by eliminating risk, really increases such risk. Now, right on that point I want to read this morning excerpts from letters by spinners to show the views held by them on the protection afforded by a hedge on these exchanges.

I first submit a statement by Mr. A. W. Emery, of the Evansville Cotton Manufacturing Co., of Indiana:

I believe the bill which you have introduced is just and right, and, so far as our observation has been, we consider the matter of dealing in futures in cotton to be detrimental to the manufacturer in every respect, as it is a form of gambling which misrepresents facts and is harmful to anyone who is in any way connected with such doubtful methods of business.

Evidently this spinner would not attempt a hedge. I next read from Mr. T. L. Wainwright, president of the Stonewall Cotton Mills of Mississippi:

Now, touching the future business, will say that I have frequently had occasion to buy so-called futures or future-contract cotton to cover actual future sales of cotton goods, but I am very sorry to have to say that we have always come out, with very few minor exceptions, with either the hot end of the poker or short end of the string in our hands. The methods of the New York Cotton Exchange are an outrage on the public. They do not afford the protection that is expected and held out. * * *

Again:

It is argued that if our American exchanges are suppressed or closed up that we transfer the market quotations, or I should say prices, to Liverpool. This I deny.

Now, down to the real practical facts, which will be attested by every sensible cotton-mill manager. The trouble is we and many others have recently and heretofore many times sold large quantities of cotton goods at profitable prices and have bought the spot cotton or futures as a hedge; then the gamblers get into the deal and depress the cotton markets from 1 to 3 or 4 cents per pound; then down goes cotton goods, the purchasers cancel their orders and leave the cotton mills with the high-price future or spot cotton on their hands and their orders for the goods all canceled. We are in this fix to-day, and with a loss from this very cause on our hands that will amount to many thousands of dollars. I have gone through this experience before. The dethroned cotton kings, and many others of their stripe and class, are absolutely to blame for these terrible conditions. So, I must repeat, from a common-sense and practical experience of a third of a century, I am unalterably opposed to the bucket shop; and, secondly, to the swindling and unjust methods followed by the New York cotton exchanges; and, thirdly, to the general practice of the so-called cotton exchanges as relates to future cotton transactions. If the whole future business were swept off the map of cotton business, I believe everybody would be far better off.

He says further that the bill under consideration covers his views and ideas exactly

Now, one from Mr. E. S. Hobbs, of the Aurora Cotton Mills, of Illinois.

In the 24 years' operation of these mills, during which time I have been connected with the active management, we have not made use of the future markets as a means of protection against unforeseen fluctuations. We are opposed to the cotton exchanges as now conducted, because they serve no legitimate purposes of commerce. The statement that they do seems plausible to the unthinking mind, but really has no foundation in fact. The producer and consumer of cotton want stability of prices; the speculators and gamblers want rapid and violent fluctuations, and use all sorts of means, honorable and otherwise, to produce them. The inevitable result is that the honest producer and consumer are defrauded.

I have many such letters, but will content myself with submitting only one more. It is from Thomas Henry & Sons, of Philadelphia, Pa. In no uncertain terms do they speak:

We think if the present cotton exchanges could be wiped out of existence the people or concerns engaged in legitimate business of cotton manufacturing would be far better off in every particular than they are at present.

Owing to the enormous rises and falls that have taken place in the cotton market quotations for the past few years it is almost impossible to do business on a legitimate basis; but if, as above stated, the exchanges were out of existence, and the old rule made to apply—that is, to make the price of cotton according to the legitimate demand and supply—it would result to the mutual advantage of the producer and the consumer, meaning the cotton-mill man as well, and the ultimate extinction of the gambling element who use the cotton market as a dummy for their gain.

Again they say:

We sincerely trust you will be able to have laws passed through both Houses to overcome the gross evils of the present cotton market, which have existed for the past 10 years, and thereby receive the everlasting gratitude of the law-abiding people who have millions of dollars invested in the manufacture of cotton fabrics.

In a letter from the same, of another date, they have this to say:

We as manufacturers to-day can not use anything in grade lower than good middling in our class of manufacture, and we question seriously whether at this moment there are 700 bales of good cotton in New York market.

Our weekly consumption of cotton is, on the average, 100 bales of strict good middling.

In our opinion, as we believe we stated in our last letter, we feel if there is any law existing permitting trading and selling future contracts (on paper), it should be wiped out for the benefit of the country at large.

You will note that this mill takes no grade of cotton lower than good middling, and that their weekly consumption calls, on an average, for 100 bales of strict good middling cotton.

I hold in my hand one of the warehouse certificates of exchange, which I submit:

New York Cotton Exchange.

Grades of cotton in New York warehouses on September 30, 1907, inspected, classed certificated, and grade guaranteed by the New York Cotton Exchange (with differences on or off middling).

There can be no revision until November 20, 1907.

GEORGE BRENNECKE,
Chairman Warehouse and Delivery Committee.

Suppose Henry & Sons had bought future contracts and accepted delivery of every bale of cotton in the stock at that time—the entire 138,484 bales—they would not have gotten sufficient strict good middling and up (22 bales) to keep their mill in operation for two days. They would have secured in all this lot of cotton only 43 bales which they could use. What folly! How dangerous it would be for them to attempt to secure their stock of raw material through this exchange.

These spinners all agree that instead of the New York Cotton Exchange being a place of refuge for them against fluctuation in the price of cotton it has become an additional menace to their business.

Now, I will go on. Yesterday the gentleman from New York asked where one could go to ascertain the difference between grades. I then replied, to spot-cotton markets in the South. In order to further answer Mr. Cocks's question I want to read what the president of the New York Cotton Exchange said about the revision of 1906 and where he suggested we go to ascertain these differences. On page 164 of the report I find this statement made by the president of the exchange: "Probably the best markets to be governed by in the actual differences are Houston and Galveston," because they are the great spot-cotton markets. The other day Mr. Neville introduced Mr. Barbot to prove that there are what is known as quarter grades, clearly distinguishable from others. He spoke also of tinges and stains, his purpose being to show that it was necessary to have this wide range of 28 grades deliverable upon future contracts. I hold in my hands the Galveston News. I want to show that so far as the cotton trade is concerned these microscopic grades are never considered. You must always keep in mind the fact that when those who consume cotton want actual cotton they go or send to the spot markets in the South for it. There the cotton is bought, assembled, and assorted as to grades, and for the purposes of the trade there are only about 7 grades of cotton considered. These other barely definable grades only serve to aid manipulation and stimulate speculation.

In Galveston, Tex., the trade requires quotations of prices for low ordinary, ordinary, good ordinary, low middling, middling, good middling, and middling fair, 7 grades; the same in Houston, the same in New Orleans, the same wherever actual cotton is dealt in; even the New York quotations that are telegraphed down to the spot markets reflect only information with reference to the value of these 7 grades. This is shown by the News, the leading paper in the leading spot market, and yet the contention is made that 28 different grades should be deliverable upon future contracts, when the spot market takes no account of more than 7, and it is the spot market at last where the spinner goes to get his cotton. The wide range of grade deliveries are useful only for purposes of manipulation and serve as an additional means of depressing or inflating prices. Now, one other phase of the question and I will conclude. What will be the result if the Scott bill is enacted into law and these purely speculative transactions are eliminated? Will it result in the destruction of the exchanges, and if so, what will follow? I will say that if a condition has developed on the New York Cotton Exchange that makes it necessary to continue transactions, 90 per cent of which are pure gambling, in order that it may exist, then it ought to be our desire to bring about a change regardless of what the consequences might be.

Mr. Chairman, I do not subscribe to the proposition that if this bill is passed the field of speculative operation will be transferred to Liverpool and the producer placed at the mercy of the English spinner. Representative HARDWICK will, before this hearing is concluded, present several amendments to the Scott bill, having for their purpose the making it impossible for the Liverpool exchange to be made the basis of these operations. If gambling in cotton was prevented in this country, would the Liverpool exchange continue to deal in futures? I have from the lips of the oldest living member of the New York Cotton Exchange, made to me in the presence of William C. Lovering—and I made this statement during the lifetime of Mr. Lovering, and did not wait until his death—Mr. Walter T. Miller, one of the men who organized the exchange, helped construct its present building, when I put the direct question to him as to what would be the effect upon the Liverpool exchange if we eliminated these speculative transactions upon the New York Cotton Exchange, this reply:

Mr. BURLESON, it would be compelled to at once abandon the practice of dealing in such contracts, because the principal source of their patronage is from this country.

Destroy this gambling and I believe the cotton exchanges of this country would at once become, like the exchange at Bremen, an exchange where spot cotton is dealt in. I do not believe any serious trade disturbance would result, regardless of the effect this bill, if law, might have on the two big exchanges.

I would not be candid, however, if I did not express my belief that there would be necessary some readjustment of trade conditions. There would be. But the intelligent producers and consumers of this country will readily devise a new system to meet the situation. Already it is in progress. The construction of a system of warehouses throughout the South has been inaugurated, where cotton can be stored and where spinners can come in direct contact, not with the producer himself, because he would not be there, but they would come in contact with the middleman. This system will not eliminate the middleman; it would not eliminate Mr. Neville as a spot merchant, not at all; it will eliminate Mr. Neville in a way as a speculator—I would not say gambler; it will eliminate Mr. Hubbard as such a speculator. These gentlemen could have their agents at the places where warehouses are located representing them, the spinning interests would be represented, and the producers' interests would also be represented, all interests represented, all there to find the cotton they need in lots of even-running grades, just as they desire it, without all this stupendous burden of expense. I do not believe and can not see one single reason why cotton should under this system be bought or sold under a wider margin by those who aid in marketing the crop. It was suggested three years ago by Mr. James R. MacColl, the president of the New England Spinners' Association, that—

The New York Cotton Exchange has become so useless to us that we must devise for ourselves a place where we can go and have spot cotton find its way there and supply our needs.

He suggested that in an address to the spinners themselves. Acting upon that, the intelligent producers of the South, for a number of years, have been erecting these warehouses and they are nearly prepared to meet the situation which will be presented if this bill should become a law.

Mr. LEVER. How many in the South do you happen to know?

Mr BURLESON. I believe it has been stated that there are some two thousand cotton warehouses there now. In this connection I will state that Mr. Haines, the secretary of the Galveston Chamber of Commerce, recently told me that capital could be readily enlisted to erect the necessary warehouses at Galveston to meet the demand, not only of Texas, but of the entire cotton territory tributary to that city, affording warehouse facilities, so that the cotton finding its way into those warehouses could readily find its way across the ocean, if needed for export purposes, or around to New England spinners, if needed by them, or the southern spinners. You need have no apprehension or fear that there is going to be any serious disturbance, any irremediable injury to the cotton trade, if this bill is enacted into law. And, gentlemen, one word more; whether this is so or not, who will be the sufferers if disturbance is occasioned, who will be the only sufferers? The producers upon the one hand and the spinners upon the other. They stand here, so far as this record is concerned, united in the expression of a desire that the Scott bill be passed and this great incubus be removed. If they are willing to take the risk and stand here to say to you that they are willing to take the risk, why should there be a single conscientious man upon this committee who would hesitate to act?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Burleson, do you think there is any danger of the formation of a great cotton trust throughout the country which would control the price of cotton and put the farmer at the mercy of the trust?

Mr. BURLESON. The suggestion—pardon me, if I indulge in strong language—the suggestion is absurd, for the reason that the American spinner is not the only consumer of American cotton; he has an active competitor upon the European Continent, an active competitor in Great Britain; no combination that could be entered into could possibly control the situation.

Mr. LEVER. You think the suggestion is radical?

Mr. BURLESON. It is ridiculous.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. ARTHUR R. MARSH, VICE PRESIDENT OF NEW YORK EXCHANGE, BY MR. BURLESON.

Mr. BURLESON. Do you operate on the New York Exchange as an individual or as a member of a firm?

Mr. MARSH. As an individual.

Mr. BURLESON. How many years have you been a member of the exchange?

Mr. MARSH. I think I was elected in 1901, but I have not kept it as an anniversary.

Mr. BURLESON. What office do you now hold on the exchange?

Mr. MARSH. Vice president.

Mr. BURLESON. What other offices have you held?

Mr. MARSH. I have been a member of the board of managers and an occasional member of this or that committee of the exchange.

Mr. BURLESON. Numbers of committees?

Mr. MARSH. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. The other day, Mr. Marsh, in response to a question by Mr. BEALL of Texas (when he asked you to distinguish between the conditions which surround the cotton trade which make it necessary to have an exchange for the sale of future contracts for cotton, and the conditions which surround the cotton goods trade, which in value represent about three times the value of the raw product, for which there is no exchange), if I understood you, you stated that the multitude of merchants, retail and wholesale, engaged in disposing of cotton goods enabled the trade to distribute any losses which might be sustained among so many or over so large an area that it was not necessary to have an exchange, but that it was necessary to have an exchange for the sale of raw cotton in order to maintain intact, or protect as far as possible, the volume of capital necessary for the prosecution of the business?

Mr. MARSH. I think that is a very accurate statement of what I said, sir.

Mr. BURLESON. There are fewer people engaged in the manufacture of wool than cotton, fewer people engaged in growing wool than cotton. It takes approximately $500,000,000 to handle the world's wool crop. Differentiate for this committee, if you can, why it is that it is necessary to have an exchange for cotton and not for wool.

Mr. MARSH. Before proceeding to speak of the wool I should like to call attention to one point which I did not make in the statement Mr. Burleson quoted from me. I said that the immense number of small merchants who handled dry goods enabled the risk to be distributed to such an extent as not to fall unbearably upon any one of them. I ought to have added to that statement the further statement that the retailers and wholesalers of dry goods work on a margin of profit so large as compared with the profit which handlers of raw cotton work on that a decline in the value of the goods which they have on hand may be very considerable before those goods get down to their cost.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, considering that additional element, please, in a few words, if you can, differentiate between the conditions which environ wool and make it unnecessary to have an exchange for the sale of future contracts for wool.

Mr. MARSH. That statement which I have just made was preliminary to a statement I desire to make with regard to wool. I have never been in the wool business myself, but a member of my family was in the wool business for a number of years, in Boston, which is now the chief wool market in this country, and I become tolerably familiar with the conditions of conducting that trade.

In the first place, in the wool trade, owing to these possibilities of loss, due to having no opportunity to hedge, the margins are kept very much wider than they are in cotton. A wool merchant expects to get, tries to get, at least 20 per cent. A cotton merchant expects to get from one-half to three-quarters of 1 per cent. But, Mr. Chairman, in spite of the wool merchant aiming to get this very much larger margin between what he pays for his wool and what he sells it to the manufacturer for, the wool business is one of the most speculative and one of the most dangerous forms of modern merchandizing.

Any wool merchant in Boston will tell you that the wool firms there go through extraordinary vicissitudes of profits and losses——

Mr. BURLESON. You evidently mistook the purpose of my question. I want you to tell this committee, if you can, the difference in conditions which environ the wool trade—I don't care whether those engaged in it lose more money or not; that is a subsequent matter—tell, if you can, the difference in conditions which environ the wool trade which make it unnecessary to have an exchange.

Mr. MARSH. The wool trade would have an exchange in a minute if it could. There is not a wool merchant in Boston——

The CHAIRMAN. Well, can you tell us in a word why it can not?

Mr. MARSH. The first and chief reason why it is impossible is that the determination of the value of a pile of wool in a warehouse is purely and simply a matter of guesswork. Wool is handled almost entirely in the grease. The value of the wool, however, is its value after it is scoured. Now, there are the most extraordinary divergencies of opinion between the most expert buyers as to the scoured value of any given pile of wool. It is a business which is more largely guesswork than any business probably in the world.

Now, when you come to taking a contract for future delivery, this element of guesswork, of uncertainty, as to the real economic value of each particular lot which is to be delivered introduces problems and perplexities which have so far proved insuperable. There was, as you know, undoubtedly, an attempt some years ago to establish a wool exchange in New York. It was never possible—never proved possible—to work out any rules for the delivery of wool on contracts which were dependable and which worked out in practice in a manner economically sound.

Another difficulty that arises in connection with wool, but along the same line, is that, although the total amount of wool produced is very large, there is a very extraordinary difference in the characters of wool that are produced, and the valuation of these extraordinarily different characters of wool has proved beyond the powers of any set of wool merchants who have ever put their brains to the matter.

In this connection, however, I should like to call your attention to the fact that there formerly was, and I supposed until I heard a positive statement to the contrary still was, trading in contracts for what are known as wool tops in Antwerp. That one specific——

Mr. BURLESON. I beg your pardon; I was not asking you whether there was an exchange at Antwerp or about a rumor of one at Antwerp. I again direct your attention to my request for conditions which environ the wool trade which you think makes it unnecessary to have an exchange, in the fewest words, please.

Mr. MARSH. Well, in the fewest words possible, the conditions that make it impossible, or so far make it impossible, are the incalculability of the particular lots of wool that have to be dealt with.

Mr. BURLESON. Now, Mr. Marsh, am I to understand by that answer that the principal reason why the trade requires no wool exchange is that there is a much larger number of grades of wool than there is of cotton?

Mr. MARSH. Yes; I am sure of it.

Mr. BURLESON. And you think the extreme doubt about the quality of wool that there is another reason why you can not have a wool exchange?

Mr. MARSH. I did not say the extreme doubt about the quality of wool. I said the extreme doubt as to the value of each particular lot of wool.

Mr. BURLESON. All right. Would not doubt as to the value of each particular lot of wool make for speculation rather than diminish the chances for it and, in fact, afford an additional reason why you should have a wool exchange, from your viewpoint, rather than a reason why you should not have one?

Mr. MARSH. Mr. BURLESON, I do not think the reason for the exchange is the opportunity it offers for speculation.

Mr. BURLESON. No, but to eliminate the risk; but I will ask you this question: Was not the principal reason for failure to establish the wool exchange in New York because the existing exchanges furnished sufficient facilities to anyone who wanted to speculate or gamble, and that the wool exchange did not receive the patronage necessary to keep it going?

Mr. MARSH. I have not been so informed. My information has been that the trouble with the wool exchange was the impossibility of making rules and regulations of a general character to apply to a commodity so incalculable in its varieties as wool.

Mr. BURLESON. You know Mr. J. R. McColl?

Mr. MARSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURLESON. He was at one time the president of the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers?

Mr. MARSH. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. You are not in accord with the view expressed by Mr. McColl when he said, speaking as to the necessity for a cotton exchange:

> Why should it be so, if the wool crop of the world, amounting in value to $500,000,000 annually, as well as the silk and linen crop, are marketed successfully without trading in futures. This system does not influence or move the crop, and it certainly affords great opportunity for speculation, which is injurious to legitimate industry. The speculator claims to foresee coming conditions. Unfortunately, this is not his chief business. It is to create temporary artificial conditions by selling quantities of cotton that he does not own or buying cotton he does not intend to accept delivery of. In the long run it must, of course, be admitted that supply and demand regulate price, but in the intermediate artificial fluctuations the speculator makes his money and the grower and manufacturer are apt to suffer disaster.

You do not agree with those views at all, although Mr. McColl is the president of a number of cotton mills and has been a manufacturer of cotton for many years.

Mr. MARSH. My first answer to that would be, Mr. BURLESON, that there is no commodity handled in the United States in which there is more constant speculation than there is in wool. The speculation in proportion to the amount of wool handled is, in my opinion, fully as great as the speculation in cotton.

Mr. BURLESON. And yet it is not necessary to have a wool exchange to hedge the risks.

Mr. MARSH. There is no exchange.

Mr. BURLESON. You said yesterday, in response to a question asked by Mr. Scott, that it was unsafe for the spinner and unwise for the spinner to go to the New York Cotton Exchange.

Mr. MARSH. Did I use those words, sir?

Mr. BURLESON. I think you did.

Mr. MARSH. Did I say unsafe?

Mr. BURLESON. I think so.

Mr. MARSH. Unsafe and unwise? I should be very glad to have the matter looked up.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, did you use the word "unwise"?

Mr. MARSH. I do not remember using the word "unwise." My recollection is that I said the contract for future delivery of cotton in New York was a cotton merchant's contract; was not designed for the use of spinners.

Mr. BURLESON. And that it was unsafe and unwise?

Mr. MARSH. I don't think I said that, sir.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, do you say it is unsafe and unwise or do you not—for him to go there?

Mr. MARSH. In determining safety and wisdom I am not particularly an expert.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, I will put it to you this way, then, if you can not readily answer the question: Does the spinner go there?

Mr. MARSH. I think he does.

Mr. BURLESON. Would you be surprised to know that Mr. McColl, of whom I spoke, in testifying before this committee has said:

> My opinion is that the spinners of this country have used the future market to a very small extent. Lately they have been forced to use it more, but they have not used it to any large extent in years gone by. There are thousands and thousands of manufacturers who have never bought a bale of futures.

Is that statement, entertaining the view that you have just——

Mr. MARSH. I think that statement is absolutely correct. I think the spinners of this country until a few years ago were of the opinion that the course for them to pursue was, as one of them stated to Mr. Hubbard and me, in a rather excited argument we had at Washington, to take a merchant's view of the situation and buy their cotton when they thought it was cheap, or sell their goods when they thought the price of the goods was high, and if they had bought their cotton when it was cheap, carry it until they sold their goods; or if they had sold their goods when they thought cotton was high, to keep short of cotton until they had a chance to buy the cotton at a lower price. It is a rather interesting commentary upon this spinner's attitude that his mill has during the last year practically gone bankrupt, that this spinner himself has been turned out of his job as treasurer of the mill, and that the Bishop of Massachusetts, who was a large stockholder in the mill, has preached a sermon against speculation.

Mr. BURLESON. Who was the spinner you speak of?

Mr. MARSH. I will not mention his name.

Mr. BURLESON. This statement made by Mr. McColl was rather a broad statement and embraced the use of futures for hedging purposes or any other purpose. I am asking you if it is not a fact that for many, many years the New England spinners especially have been extremely hostile to the New York Cotton Exchange upon the ground that its practices were inimical to their interests or the interests of the trade?

Mr. MARSH. The older generation of spinners in New England was unquestionably hostile to the New York Cotton Exchange or any cotton exchange, but the new generation of New England spinners who are just getting into the field are, so far as I know, unanimously of the opinion that they could not conduct their business without the aid of the exchanges. And the reason for that, Mr. Chairman, if Mr. BURLESON cares to have it, I will give.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; I would like to have any reason you can give, if you can put it in a few words.

Mr. MARSH. I can, sir. The older mill treasurers of New England began with small mills and gradually built them up to large mills. When their mills were small they had no trouble in going to the banks and borrowing money enough to buy the cotton, which was comparatively small in amount, to run their mills. As their mills grew and these older treasurers remained in the saddle, the banks insensibly enlarged their accommodations to these treasurers, and so until the end of the career of these successful old treasurers they had no trouble in getting the money from the banks to buy the cotton which they needed. But now, sir, younger men are taking the place of these old treasurers, and the banks are beginning to ask questions. They say, "It was all right for us to lend money enough to buy 100,000 bales of cotton to Mr. Thomas Jefferson Coolidge, who was a seasoned veteran, who had grown up in this business, who had made an enormous amount of money for his mill, and we could trust him; but how about this young man who has got to come in and take his place? Are we willing to lend eight or ten million dollars to this young man on his judgment as to when is the right time to buy cotton? This young man has not been through the mill. We can not trust his judgment."

And the consequence is, sir, that as these younger spinners come along they are abandoning, and abandoning, perforce, the manner of conducting the business of those older spinners, and now you will find younger spinners in New England conducting their spinning to a large extent in the way in which the English spinner conducts his business. He hedges his sales of goods by buying some cotton; or if he buys cotton at a time when he thinks the quality he desires is most easily obtainable he sells or hedges against it.

Mr. BURLESON. Then in a nutshell you say the reason for this change is that the moneyed class in New England had a confidence in the old spinners that they have not in the younger ones, and here the bankers force the latter to hedge? If that is so, no man would be better advised of it than the president of the New York Cotton Exchange, would he? If this change in sentiment had taken place, or this viewpoint has changed, on the part of the New England spinner, there would be no person who would be better informed about it than the president of the New York Cotton Exchange?

Mr. MARSH. The president of the New York Cotton Exchange never lived in New England, and I have lived there.

Mr. BURLESON. But is it not his duty to keep posted, Mr. Marsh, and haven't you said that one of the great advantages of this exchange was the facilities and opportunities its membership had for keeping right up with the trade, for gathering all kinds of information from all sources with reference to the trade? Would you say, then, that you would expect ignorance upon the part of the president of the exchange with reference to this change of sentiment on the part of the New England spinner?

Mr. MARSH. I should not expect anything.

Mr. BURLESON. Let me read you something that was said by the president of the New York Cotton Exchange, addressing the New England spinners [reading]:

The hostile attitude taken by the spinners of New England at the formation of our exchange and which has continued with more or less intensity during the past 36 years—

It was organized in 1871, and 36 years would bring it down to 1907, would it not? I haven't the date, but I take it from that that it must have been in 1906 or 1907 when this address was made [continuing reading]— was, and is, to my mind, a mistaken policy, which the spinners of England and Continental Europe have avoided by their daily intercourse with merchants from all portions of the world.

If this change of attitude has taken place, Mr. Hubbard, who made that address, was not aware of it, was he, unless he was making a very loose statement or a false statement?

Mr. MARSH. I don't know what Mr. Hubbard was aware of.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, if he made that statement, was he mistaken about it?

Mr. MARSH. A tendency had already set up which he did not call attention to in that statement, unquestionably.

Mr. BURLESON. And it has ripened in the last two years into a complete change, you would think?

Mr. MARSH. So far as the younger spinners are concerned.

Mr. BURLESON. There is about as much cotton manufactured in the South as in New England. The president of the American (Southern) Cotton Spinners' Association was here, Mr. Parker. Do its members patronize the New York Cotton Exchange to any extent?

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Parker?

Mr. BURLESON. No; I didn't say Mr. Parker. I said the southern cotton spinners.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Parker is one of the best customers of the New York Cotton Exchange.

Mr. BURLESON. I didn't say Mr. Parker. I said the southern spinners.

Mr. MARSH. The southern spinners certainly use the facilities to a large extent.

Mr. BURLESON. Did you grasp the meaning of that resolution they adopted when they said the conditions on the New York Exchange made it unsafe to attempt to hedge there? How do you explain that if that is true? Can it be explained, Mr. Marsh?

Mr. MARSH. It can be explained; yes.

Mr. BURLESON. How do you explain it if it is true?

Mr. MARSH. I explain it as the case of certain gentlemen wishing to force certain other gentlemen to do something they want to have them do and using severe language to that end.

Mr. BURLESON. Then you take issue with the sincerity of statement embodied in that resolution, do you?

Mr. MARSH. I certainly do.

Mr. BURLESON. What is it that fixes the price of a future contract on the New York Exchange?

Mr. MARSH. A member of the exchange ready to buy and another member ready to sell at that price.

Mr. BURLESON. It is the fact that an offer is made and accepted which fixes the price of futures?

Mr. MARSH. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. Now, what is the basis which controls the fixing of a price by the seller? In other words, upon what is the price to sell based?

Mr. MARSH. In the case of a merchant hedging it is based on what he has paid for his cotton in the South.

Mr. BURLESON. As a matter of fact, you maintain a reserve in New York City of cotton to be delivered or tendered on contracts?

Mr. MARSH. We do not maintain a reserve. There is, under the natural operation of our by-laws and rules, a reserve there.

Mr. BURLESON. We will get to that in a minute. I want to know if there is a reserve there?

Mr. MARSH. There is a reserve there; yes.

Mr. BURLESON. As a matter of fact, is not the price of future contract based upon what is in that reserve, and does not a knowledge of what is in that reserve control and fix the price of the future contract?

Mr. MARSH. No, sir.

Mr. BURLESON. You know Mr. J. F. Maury? [After a pause.] I mean Mr. James F. Maury. He is a member of your exchange.

Mr. MARSH. Then I know him.

Mr. BURLESON. A sufficiently important member of your exchange to have been continued for a number of years as chairman of one of the important committees of the exchange.

Mr. MARSH. He is the treasurer of the exchange.

Mr. BURLESON. The present treasurer?

Mr. MARSH. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. What do you think of this statement coming from Mr. Maury?—

The present price of our futures represents the value of the kind and grades of cotton which the buyer expects to get if he calls for delivery.

Is that true or was he mistaken about that?

Mr. MARSH. In one sense of the word it is true, and in another sense of the word it is not true. It is, of course, true that the character of cotton likely to be delivered in New York in its relation to middling cotton will have an effect on the price of futures relative to the prevailing price for middling cotton.

Mr. BURLESON. Then you accept that statement of Mr. Maury as true?

Mr. MARSH. Absolutely and completely? No, sir.

Mr. BURLESON. You do not?

Mr. MARSH. No.

Mr. BURLESON. Now, then, see if the chairman of your committee, Mr. Maury, has not stated the whole truth in that particular; see if you agree on this part of his statement:

He expects low grades and mixed lots, and so forth.

That is the man to whom cotton is tendered under the contract. He expects low grades and mixed lots.

Mr. MARSH. When?

Mr. BURLESON. When the cotton is tendered to him under the future contracts that are made on the New York exchange.

Mr. MARSH. There are no such grades in the stock in the port of New York at the present time, and so he can not possibly expect it.

Mr. BURLESON. Then, what do you think about this statement (I read from Mr. Maury's report):

If you go to any great southern market, as Memphis, New Orleans, Galveston, etc., you will see large lots of cotton of the various spinners' grades inspected and classed out in even-running lines of single grades, ready for purchase by spinners or exporters. We used to see these in New York years ago, but we do not now—it does not pay to send them here.

Mr MacColl, president of the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers, in his recent address on April 24, advises establishing a cotton exchange in New England, especially for spot cotton, to bring the planter and spinner nearer together, and to have fixed standards of grade and sworn classers. We have all these and a working system tested by years, but it is tied down to a small number of bales of mixed lots brought to New York, because they are hard to handle elsewhere.

The speculative business will come here, too, because here are the largest number of buyers and sellers, and our future prices will then be based upon spinners' cotton, as they can not be said to be now.

The cotton world is demanding of us that we must represent the real trading basis, the spot prices for spinners' cotton, not prices based on "overs," low grades, and speculation.

That is the statement made by Mr. Maury in this report which he made to the New York Cotton Exchange, "that your prices for future cotton were based on overs, low grades, and speculation, and not on spot cotton." Is that true or false? That can be answered yes or no. You understand the question, do you not?

Mr. MARSH. I don't think I do.

Mr. BURLESON. I will repeat it in order that you may understand its full meaning, because I want you to answer it, whether it is true or not. This is the report to the exchange made by Mr. Maury, and he makes this statement.

Mr. MARSH. Will you permit me to ask there what that report is. You say a report made by Mr. Maury?

Mr. BURLESON. As chairman of your classification committee, I believe you call it, which was made July 10, 1907, before the New York Exchange. It was by a committee of the New York Exchange, the "Committee on Licensing Warehouses," of which Mr. Maury was chairman. I will read it again, because I want you to understand it, and I want you to say whether it is a false statement or not. There are certain facts connected with this business upon which you are entitled to draw your conclusions, and I want to agree with you, if I can, on the facts, and you may draw your conclusions and I will draw mine from the same facts. I want to ask you now this question. I will read this again:

The cotton world is demanding of us that we must represent the real trading basis, the spot prices for spinners' cotton, not prices based on "overs," low grades, and speculation.

Now, Mr. Marsh, I want to know whether or not this statement made by Mr. Maury and four or five or six others—how many exchange members are there on that committee? It was signed by all the membership of the committee. Is it true?

Mr. MENDELBAUM. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. I think Mr. Marsh is entirely competent to take care of himself.

Mr. MENDELBAUM. He has stated that he was chairman of the committee on licensing warehouses, and if Mr. BURLESON would read exactly what was said there he would see that he was chairman of the committee dealing with the proposition to deal with southern warehouses.

The CHAIRMAN. I will repeat that I think Mr. Marsh is capable of taking care of himself, and I prefer to have it left with him.

Mr. MARSH. I answer that question, Mr. BURLESON, by saying that Mr. Maury was absolutely correct in saying that the world expected the New York Cotton Exchange—will you read just what that is?

Mr. BURLESON. I agree to that part of it. I agree that that is what the world is demanding of your cotton exchange. That is not the part I am after. "Spot prices for spinners' cotton, not prices based on overs, low grades, and speculation." Now, I ask you the question, Are your prices based on overs, low grades, and speculation?

Mr. MARSH. I reply that they are not, and never have been.

Mr. BURLESON. Then the statement made by Mr. Maury to that effect is not true?

Mr. MARSH. He does not say that they are.

Mr. BURLESON. What does he say, if he does not say that; what is the purport of his statement, Mr. Marsh?

Mr. MARSH. You have the statement before you.

Mr. BURLESON. I certainly have, and I have read it, and I so understand it. If he does not say that they are based on overs, low grades, and speculation, what does he say that they are based on?

Mr. MARSH. I can not see from the statement that he says they are based on anything.

Mr. BURLESON. Are you content with that answer to that question?

Mr. MARSH. I think the answer is a good answer to the question.

Mr. BURLESON. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you one question there. Would it be a fair inference from the statement Mr. BURLESON has read that in the judgment of Mr. Maury the prices are based on overs, low grades, and speculation?

Mr. MARSH. It would be a fair inference. If I might have an opportunity to explain——

Mr. BURLESON. I will give you an opportunity later.

Mr. MARSH. May I suggest that I am in the hands of the chairman, and not asking the privilege of the gentleman from Texas? I await the ruling of the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. I think it would be fair to let the gentleman explain the circumstances.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Maury is a member of the New York Cotton Exchange. He has not been in the active cotton business for many years. He is a man whom we all greatly esteem, and whose position as a member of the New York Cotton Exchange commands the highest respect on the part of his fellow members. But he has not been in the active cotton business for many years. If I may venture to say so, he is somewhat of a theorist, and he has conceived a certain opinion as to the necessity of the cotton exchange extending its license warehouse system to Southern States, and in arguing for that position he has rather taken up the current talk about the stock of cotton in the port of New York, which he is not himself handling, and which he has not handled for many years. Therefore that answers that.

Mr. BURLESON. All right. If you repudiate Mr. Maury and his committee, I ask if you know Mr. James T. Milne?

Mr. MARSH. Yes; I think I do know who he is

Mr. BURLESON. Is he a member of the New York Cotton Exchange? There are only 450 of them.

Mr. MARSH. I think not. I was not sure, but I think not. He is an unimportant person.

Mr. BURLESON. Unimportant, but has he been a member of the New York Cotton Exchange?

Mr. MARSH. That I can not answer. Does anybody here know whether Mr. Milne has been a member?

Mr. MENDLEBAUM. Yes, sir; he is.

Mr. BURLESON. All right. What do you think of a man who is a member of the New York Cotton Exchange, or has been a member of the New York Cotton Exchange, saying this? He was a member at the time that this statement was made:

Referring to yours of the 14th, asking my views as to the particular difference between grades, I am not now in touch with the business sufficiently to form an opinion. My contention is that cottons which have no standing or class in primary markets are not entitled to recognition or listing by the New York Cotton Exchange. The fact that they are listed and an arbitrary value fixed, and that a buyer of contracts must accept them at the value fixed by the exchange, a value that can not be obtained anywhere else in the world, is in my judgment a standing disgrace reflecting on the integrity or intelligence of every influential member. Whatever may be said regarding past operation of exchange business is proof that the system has given satisfaction, it is true nevertheless that the public is awakening to the fact that "heads, I win; tails, you lose" means that the profit all the time goes to one side, and is not, as it first strikes the ear, a fair deal to both.

Now, I want to know if there is any truth in that statement, made by a man who was a member of the exchange at the time it was made.

Mr. MARSH. It does not seem to me that there is any truth in it. It never has seemed so to me.

Mr. BURLESON. You said, in response to a question asked by Mr. SIMS the other day, in a hypothetical case that he put to you, attempting to show that the price of futures was affected by combination, that it was a pipe dream, or some other expression—I believe you said it was a "fish story." Now, Mr. Marsh, let me read you this, referring to a slump in cotton:

Look as critically as we may, we can find no germane weakness that would account for the sudden collapse of the market. We must look to some outside agency. It is easily found. The slump was the result of a premeditated attack and persistent onslaught by a party of New York operators, backed by ample capital and prestige in speculation.

Mr. MARSH. I should say that was a fish story, too.

Mr. BURLESON. You would say that it was not true, then, would you? That is what I want to know. When you say "a fish story," do you mean that it is not true?

Mr. NEVILLE. Might I ask whom he is quoting from?

Mr. BURLESON. You will have it in a minute. What do you think of this? Is this also a "fish story"?

If we believed that the present prices were the result of natural and legitimate causes, we would advise our friends to accept these prices and turn their cotton into money without delay. But we do not believe that the present prices are natural or legitimate. The brief experience we have had with the market this season before speculation interfered showed that consumers were willing to pay the prevailing prices and producers were willing to accept them. If business had been permitted to run its natural course, probably the increased volume of receipts would have gradually lowered prices. This would have been a natural and acceptable result. But when an outside element that knows nothing about cotton and has no interest therein except as a medium for gambling profits arbitrarily, interferes between the producer and consumer and undertakes to fix prices by sheer force of money and manipulation, we believe in suspending the rules and striking with the weapon at hand.

Mr. BURLESON (continuing). What would you say about an opinion expressed by that man about the ability of a combination to go in and drive prices up and force prices down?

Mr. MARSH. I should think he was sore.

Mr. BURLESON. Would you think it was true or false?

Mr. MARSH. I should think again that it was a "fish story."

Mr. BURLESON. What do you mean by that? Somebody may not know what you mean by that. I do not know myself; I do not know whether you mean to say that it is a false statement or not.

Mr. MARSH. An intentionally false statement?

Mr. BURLESON. I don't care whether you say it is intentionally false or not.

Mr. MARSH. I think on the face of it it is false, as a matter of fact.

Mr. BURLESON. That was a statement made on September 16, 1907, by the president of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, W. B. Thompson. Is he a member of the New York Cotton Exchange also?

Mr. MARSH. He is not.

Mr. BURLESON. Has he ever been?

Mr. MARSH. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. BURLESON. You say, Mr. Marsh, that statement is a "fish story." Now, let me ask you this: What is the standard by which you fix differences between the various grades of cotton in the New York Cotton Exchange? That is, the standard used by your revision committee. The committee consists of 17 members, I believe.

Mr. MARSH. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. What is the standard they use?

Mr. MARSH. I explained to the committee this morning that the revision committee of the New York Cotton Exchange as it now does its work endeavors to arrive at a fair and reasonable valuation of the different grades of cotton as compared with middling, taking into account its information as to the probable quantities of those grades in the crop——

Mr. BURLESON. Right there, is there any rule of the New York Cotton Exchange that requires them to do that?

Mr. MARSH. There is not.

Mr. BURLESON. Is there any rule of the New York Cotton Exchange which prescribes a standard to guide them in fixing the difference in value of the grades?

Mr. MARSH. There is not, sir.

Mr. BURLESON. Is it not a fact that they invariably overvalue the grades of cotton that are least in demand?

Mr. MARSH. How is that?

Mr. BURLESON. Does not the revision committee in the New York Cotton Exchange fix the values of grades not in demand higher than they should be?

Mr. MARSH. The commissioner of corporations in his last volume charges the New York——

Mr. BURLESON. I beg your pardon; I am not asking you about the report of the commissioner of corporations of New York. I am asking you as a matter of fact—well, I will get at it in another way. Is it not a fact, Mr. Marsh, that New York has ceased to be a spot market for cotton?

Mr. MARSH. Well, there are several hundred thousand bales of spot cotton dealt in in New York every year.

Mr. BURLESON. I will ask you if the number of bales of spot brought to New York is not brought there by reason of an artificial condition created by your exchange?

Mr. MARSH. I do not think they are brought there by an artificial condition. They are brought there because you can get more for them there than in some other market.

Mr. BURLESON. Is not the fact that you can get more for them there than in any other market purely an artificial condition?

Mr. MARSH. Cotton always goes where you can get the highest price for it. That is not artificial.

Mr. BURLESON. Exactly——

Mr. MARSH. If it goes to the spinner——

Mr. BURLESON. No, no; that is the very point I am trying to get at, Mr. Marsh. Is it not a fact that if it goes to New York at all to find a market that is because of an artificial condition?

Mr. MARSH. Well, sir, New York is alive and doing business, and cotton goes there. That may be artificial, or it may not; I can not answer that question.

Mr. BURLESON. Is not that one of the serious problems confronting the New York Cotton Exchange, as to how to bring cotton there, how to make cotton come there?

Mr. MARSH. It is unquestionably one of the problems we have to deal with.

Mr. BURLESON. And is it not a fact that the revision committee for years has overvalued the cotton least desirable or least in demand—overvalued it, understand—in order to draw it there?

Mr. MARSH. No, sir.

Mr. BURLESON. You say it is not?

Mr. MARSH. It is not.

Mr. BURLESON. You wrote a letter to the Atlanta Constitution, did you not, Mr. Marsh, in April, 1907? I referred to it in a speech I delivered in the House, and it is embodied in the Smith report. Of course I am not asking you to accept this report or any fact in it, but I am going to ask you about this letter. Did you write a letter?

Mr. MARSH. My impression is that I wrote two or three letters.

Mr. BURLESON. On April 26, 1907?

Mr. MARSH. I think I wrote one to the Constitution.

Mr. BURLESON. Did you not, in this letter, state that it cost somebody one dollar and a half for every bale of cotton stopped off in New York?

Mr. MARSH. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. And that cotton sought by the consumers, the spinners, would not come there because the spinners could outbid those who wanted it to come there?

Mr. MARSH. Will you read exactly what I said?

Mr. BURLESON. Well, I want to know if that is substantially correct.

Mr. MARSH. No, that is not substantially correct.

Mr. BURLESON (reading)—

> Years ago, in the early days of the New York Cotton Exchange, New York was a market in which large quantities of all kinds of cotton were regularly carried in stock and offered for sale to spinners precisely like stocks of dry goods and other commodities which are now even carried and sold by the New York merchants. This is no longer the case, as it was discovered some 20 years ago by New England spot brokers that they could buy cotton in the South and sell it to New England spinners at practically the same price the New York merchants had to pay for their cotton delivered in New York. In other words, these New England brokers see that every bale of cotton that comes to New York and is carried in warehouses is subject to an expense of $1.50, which is not incurred if the same cotton is shipped direct from the South to the spinner. By saving this $1.50 per bale the New England broker was able to steadily undersell the New York cotton merchant and speedily capture all the old-time business in spot cotton which formerly New York controlled. Spinners ceased to come to New York in search of cotton for their mills, and the result was that the New York market was no longer able to carry at all times the considerable stock of all kinds of cotton it formerly did. * * *
> Now, as has been pointed out above, every bale of cotton that comes to New York regularly costs somebody $1.50 to cover New York expenses; evidently, then, it is never possible for any character of cotton which spinners are buying freely throughout the South to come to New York at all. The mere saving of $1.50 per bale enables the spinner always to outbid New York for such cotton as he is buying freely.

Did I misquote you?

Mr. MARSH. You did, sir.

Mr. BURLESON. In what respect?

Mr. MARSH. Because you left out the phrase, "The spinners were buying freely throughout the South."

Mr. BURLESON. No; was not that what I said, that New York could not get the character of cotton that the spinners were buying? That is neither here nor there. It will not stop there, unless it costs somebody $1.50, will it?

Mr. MARSH. That is true.

Mr. BURLESON. If it does not come there somebody loses $1.50 on it, because he could get $1.50 more for it if the spinners were buying it freely in the South, more than the New York parties could pay. Is not that true?

Mr. MARSH. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. Now I will ask you if you did not use this expression in that same address:

> One of the most serious problems of the New York Cotton Exchange has been and is to frame its contracts so that a sufficient supply of actual cotton will regularly come to New York to insure the maintenance of this reserve.

Mr. MARSH. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BURLESON. Now, then, in order to get cotton to New York, you must overvalue the grades that are not being used by the spinners or demanded by the spinners freely to the extent of that $1.50, must you not?

Mr. MARSH. No, sir.

Mr. BURLESON. Then, how do you get it there, and what makes it come there?

Mr. MARSH. Any grade of cotton correctly valued which spinners do not happen to be buying freely at a given moment and which the holders desire to sell will come to New York.

Mr. BURLESON. Will come to New York if it is going to lose somebody $1.50 to get it there?

Mr. MARSH. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. Cost him $1.50 more than he could get it by shipping it straight to the spinner, or south for export purposes?

Mr. MARSH. But the statement there is that the spinner is not buying that kind of cotton freely. That is the statement you have got before you, sir.

Mr. BURLESON. Is that what is termed "overs"?

Mr. MARSH. I don't know what are termed "overs."

Mr. BURLESON. Well, if there is a lot of cotton in the South and the spinners are buying freely, and there are certain grades that are not being taken by the spinners, and they leave it over and do not buy it, is not that what Mr. Maury meant in his report when he said overs?

Mr. MARSH. I don't know.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, is that what you mean by overs; is that an expression that is used on the cotton exchange?

Mr. MARSH. It is an expression that is used by cotton merchants, and the meaning of it is this: If a spot-cotton merchant has contracted to deliver to a spinner a hundred or a thousand bales of even-running cotton, an even grade, and in order to get that he has to buy from the producer 200 or 500 or 2,000 bales of all kinds of cotton, then what is bought beyond the hundred or the thousand bales of even-running cotton is called overs.

Mr. BURLESON. That which the spinners do not desire, then——

Mr. MARSH. That which the spot merchant has not contracted at the moment to deliver——

Mr. BURLESON. Has not been able to dispose of?

Mr. MARSH. Has not disposed of.

Mr. BURLESON. Is what is called overs?

Mr. MARSH. What the spot merchant has not disposed of.

Mr. BURLESON. Is that what you meant when you said, then, that cotton that was not in demand freely by spinners would find its way to New York?

Mr. MARSH. That is a part of it; yes.

Mr. BURLESON. What is the other part?

Mr. MARSH. Cotton comes to New York which is not overs.

Mr. BURLESON. Now, what is it?

Mr. MARSH. Spot merchants buy the cotton in the South and ship it to New York.

Mr. BURLESON. At a loss of $1.50 a bale?

Mr. MARSH. Certainly not.

Mr. BURLESON. For the purpose of certificating in the New York Cotton Exchange?

Mr. MARSH. And for delivering it on contracts.

Mr. BURLESON. For the purpose of certificating it for the New York Cotton Exchange?

Mr. MARSH. It must be certificated to deliver.

Mr. BURLESON. To be delivered on the New York Cotton Exchange?

Mr. MARSH. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. On contracts for future delivery?

Mr. MARSH. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. Now, I want to ask you if you do not think there is extreme danger in permitting a committee of active members of the exchange to fix the difference in value between grades, in the month of November, to obtain until the following September?

Mr. MARSH. I do not approve, myself, of that method of arriving at the valuation of different grades of cotton.

Mr. BURLESON. Why don't you approve of it?

Mr. MARSH. Because I think the different grades of cotton ought to be valued on the basis of their value to the spinner.

Mr. BURLESON. Their value to the spinner is fixed by the demand of the spinner for that particular grade of cotton, is it not?

Mr. MARSH. What is that?

Mr. BURLESON. Their value to the spinner is fixed by the demand of the spinner for that particular grade; the law of supply and demand would fix the value of it, so far as the spinner was concerned; and its value would depend upon the number of bales of a particular grade and the number of spinners who wanted that grade of cotton?

Mr. MARSH. The value to the spinner is determined by what he gets out of a given grade in the shape of yarns and goods, as against what he gets out of middling.

Mr. BURLESON. You mean, you would determine it as to its spinning value, as against the value determined by commercial conditions?

Mr. MARSH. What do you mean by "commercial conditions"?

Mr. BURLESON. The amount of a particular grade, for instance, and the demand on the part of the spinners for cotton of that particular grade.

Mr. MARSH. I would fix it upon the basis of what it is worth to the spinner.

Mr. BURLESON. How many members of the exchange agree in that view?

Mr. MARSH. I never counted them.

Mr. BURLESON. As a matter of fact, there is a faction on the New York Cotton Exchange who do not concur in the view that this system in vogue is the best system of fixing differences in values of grade, is there not?

Mr. MARSH. A faction?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

Mr. MARSH. I do not know of any such faction on the New York Cotton Exchange.

Mr. BURLESON. Is there any division of opinion as to whether——

Mr. MARSH. Undoubtedly; there are great diversities of opinion.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, what proportion of the members of the exchange approve of the present plan for fixing the differences in value of grades?

Mr. MARSH. At the present time?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

Mr. MARSH. There is no way on earth of our telling that.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, take the last time you had a test of the proposition?

Mr. MARSH. We have never had a test of the proposition since it was originally adopted by a two-thirds majority.

Mr. BURLESON. Is it not a fact that the majority of the New York Cotton Exchange are now in favor, or were a couple of years ago, of changing your present rule for fixing differences between grades?

Mr. MARSH. We had no vote upon it. I have no earthly way of telling whether a majority are or are not in favor of it.

Mr. BURLESON. I will ask you if the suggestion was not made that instead of fixing differences in September and November, that one more month for fixing the differences should be added?

Mr. MARSH. Yes; that suggestion was made.

Mr. BURLESON. Was it voted upon?

Mr. MARSH. It was voted upon.

Mr. BURLESON. How was the vote?

Mr. MARSH. The vote was a tie.

Mr. BURLESON. Was not the vote on that proposition 163 in favor of the change and 123 against it, it being lost because it failed to receive two-thirds vote in its favor?

Mr. MARSH. Those are not the figures that I have in my mind.

Mr. BURLESON. The New York Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin is in favor with you exchange people, is it not?

Mr. MARSH. I don't see what that has to do with it.

Mr. BURLESON. I want to get at the truth, as to whether or not they would misrepresent the New York Cotton Exchange to its prejudice.

Mr. MARSH. Well, this was a matter of history. My impression is that the chairman of this committee has the exact figures of the vote on this occasion. I heard, before I left New York, that the chairman of this committee requested that the figures of that vote should be reported to him, and if that is correct—if I am correct in that—there is no use in discussing the question, because it is a matter of fact that may be determined.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be among my papers, but I have not seen it.

Mr. NEVILLE. I have those figures here.

Mr. BURLESON. Was not that the vote, as I have given it?

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Neville said his impression was that the vote was 100 to 100, and that was my impression. But I do not attempt to carry in my memory the exact figures of all the votes which are taken on the New York Cotton Exchange.

Mr. NEVILLE. Here you are [handing witness a memorandum].

Mr. MARSH (reading). "One hundred yeas and 100 nays."

Mr. BURLESON. When was that vote taken?

Mr. MARSH. The 13th of November, 1907.

Mr. BURLESON. I referred to the vote on the 25th of January, 1907. At that time was not the proposition voted upon and was it not published in the newspapers the next morning? I refer to the vote on the 25th of January, 1907. Was there not a vote upon that proposition; was there not a vote on the elimination of certain of the quarter grades?

Mr. NEVILLE. Will you pardon my suggestion? You have read the vote. Would you mind reading what they voted on? Perhaps that would give us some light on the subject we are discussing. I think there was something else that you had in mind that was voted upon.

Mr. BURLESON. I have this data here. I clipped it from the New York paper myself. [Reading from the New York Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin, January 25, 1907:]

The New York Cotton Exchange yesterday adopted by ballot the amendment proposed by the manager to its by-laws, which makes strict low middling stained the lowest grade of cotton deliverable under exchange contracts. The change will take effect in January, 1908. An amendment was also adopted eliminating all the quarter grades.

The proposed amendment changing the dates of meetings of the revision committee from the second Wednesday in September and the third Wednesday in November to the third Wednesday in September,

November, and February was not carried, considerable opposition having developed to this feature by Wall Street and spot houses, as shown by the following circular, which all members found in their mail yesterday morning:

"We, the undersigned, are of the opinion, after giving the subject considerable consideration, that it would not be advisable to have an other revision of differences between grades of cotton commencing February, 1908, as it would have an unsettling effect on the market by restricting transactions during December and January. Operators would do very little during that period, pending the uncertainty of February revision, particularly Europeans, who at times do a large business. The importers and jobbers in coffee have no fear of further revision, as the coffee exchange abolished the rule for fixing differences after it adopted the present differences between grades.

"A vote by ballot will be taken at our exchange to-morrow, Wednesday, January 23, between 11 a. m. and 2 p. m.

"We hope you will be present. If you can not, proxy can be used, which will be furnished by Henry Hentz & Co., or some of the signers of this.

"HENRY HENTZ & CO.	HENRY CLEWS & CO.
"STEPHEN M. WELD & CO.	C. B. GUEST & CO.
"FERNIE, WILSON & CO.	W. R. CRAIG & CO.
"T. M. ROBINSON & CO.	C. E. RICH & CO.
"WILLIAM RAY & CO.	LATHAM, ALEXANDER & CO.
"HOPKINS, DWIGHT & CO.	SIEGF, GRUENER & CO."
"SHEARSON, HAMMILL & CO.

The vote on the first two amendments was overwhelmingly in favor, but the figures on the revision amendments were 163 in favor and 123 against it, it being lost because it failed to receive a two-thirds vote in its favor.

Mr. MARSH. I had forgotten that any vote was taken at that time on the proposition to increase the number of revision dates. The occasion which I had in my mind was the 13th of November, 1907, when a vote was taken on the proposition to make the number of revision dates three instead of two, and on the 13th of November, 1907, the vote was yeas 100, nays 100, which shows a very considerable change in sentiment from the vote which Mr. BURLESON reads.

Mr. BURLESON. What is the date of that?

Mr. MARSH. November 13, 1907.

Mr. BURLESON. This was January, 1907. Is it or is it not a fact that vote took place?

Mr. MARSH. I don't remember it myself, sir. I presume it did, from the fact that you have a report from a reputable paper that it did take place.

Mr. BURLESON. I will ask you what influences the members; is there any pressure brought to bear upon the members to vote a particular way upon this amendment?

Mr. MARSH. Not in the least.

Mr. BURLESON. Is there a vestige of truth in this, or is it a "fish story":

"The people who believe in reforming the New York contract have the votes," said one prominent member, "but the old machine has the organization." There has been a great awakening among the members, but at the same time the people with business to give out to other members usually get what they want, and the machine may win again, although it is to be remembered that the last annual election was not a victory for the revision of November, 1906.

Is there any truth in that statement, taken from the same newspaper?

Mr. MARSH. Not a vestige of truth.

Mr. BURLESON. No such influences are brought to bear by members of the exchange who deal in large volumes of cotton or who deal in large transactions on the cotton exchange, on these brokers who have a vote upon the proposition, suggesting that they will not give them their business unless they vote in a particular way?

Mr. MARSH. Not a vestige or iota of truth in it.

Mr. BURLESON. I am glad to hear you say so. [Reading further:]

It should not be overlooked, however, that a few very strong and influential firms, especially if they have representatives on the revision committee, may, in one way or another, create a sentiment that must necessarily influence the committee in their action. For instance, a large spot-cotton firm, which also operates extensively in futures, might through its extensive brokerage payments easily influence some members of the exchange serving on the revision committee who were favored with its patronage. Indeed, it is alleged that precisely this thing has happened in New York, and moreover that such large operators have thus been able to influence the election of boards of managers and through them the appointment of revision committees.

What would you say, that that was true or false?

Mr. MARSH. I should say that that was an admirable illustration of what I said this morning to the effect that the report of the Commissioner of Corporations is so lacking in sound and exact knowledge of the facts and in sound and discriminating deductions from the facts that it carries no intellectual authority with any thinking member of the New York Cotton Exchange.

Mr. BURLESON. Now, one more question, and I will be through. You have heard the description of the condition or a state of facts read by me from Mr. Thompson. I want to ask you this question: Can such a condition of the market for futures in New York as charged by Mr. Thompson be brought about by the use of money or independent of current conditions as to supply and demand?

Mr. MARSH. It absolutely can not be brought about.

Mr. SIMS. Then Mr. Thompson's statement is not true?

Mr. MARSH. It is not true.

Mr. BURLESON. Not only not true as a fact but impossible of performance?

Mr. MARSH. Yes.

Mr. MENDELBAUM. You may have heard the statement of Senator Smith of South Carolina who came here and made what I considered a stump speech, in which he claimed that all the members of the New York Cotton Exchange stand together to rob the outsider, and then consider the line of questions propounded by Mr. Burleson, who tries to show the different factions that exist on the New York Cotton Exchange, can they happen at the same time or would that be possible?

Mr. MARSH. Of course Senator Smith's statement was made without exact knowledge of the facts, and he certainly would not have made it if he had been acquainted with the facts firsthand.

Mr. BURLESON. Bearing directly upon what Mr. Mendelbaum said, you know Mr. Scales?

Mr. MARSH. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. He was at one time a member of the exchange, was he not?

Mr. MARSH. I don't think so. I don't think he was.

Mr. HUBBARD. I think he was one of them.

Mr. NEVILLE. I don't know.

Mr. MARSH. He is not now.

Mr. HUBBARD. E. G. Scales was a member.

Mr. NEVILLE. Is that the letter the chairman read from the rostrum?

Mr. BURLESON. No; this is another one. [Reading:]

The cotton exchange is a good thing for the producer if their rules are fair, but as it stands to-day it would be best to put them out of existence, as they have their rules so that they can get the country in and then skin them.

Mr. MARSH. Is Mr. Scales the country?

Mr. NEVILLE. Mr. Chairman, I am no lawyer, but we are trying to get a record before this committee in proper shape and personal allusions without the appearance of the witness to be cross-examined is something that you have studiously avoided up to now, and I consider that in all fairness the admission of such letters as that in the testimony is contrary to the policy that you adopted when you started this investigation.

The CHAIRMAN. As I understand it, Mr. BURLESON only used that expression as a postulate for a question. If there is any other present it does not appear.

Mr. NEVILLE. I move it be stricken out, because if Mr. Scales had that view he ought to be here for cross-examination.

Mr. BURLESON. In view of that I will read the entire letter. [Reading:]

THE WALDORF-ASTORIA,
New York, February 14, 1910.

Hon. A. S. BURLESON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The inclosed copy of a letter I wrote explains itself. If you can force the New York Cotton Exchange to change its rules so that the spinner can buy a certain grade of cotton on the exchange and get what he buys at once instead of something else, you will have done the whole South the greatest service you could possibly do.

While the New York future contracts sentimentally regulate the price of cotton in the South, that contract is so unfair to those who buy it, by forcing them to accept something that they don't want, that it is a menace to legitimate trade and has the effect of keeping prices unnaturally low. If changed as I suggest, it will advance the price of spot cotton and then cotton buyers and spinners will have a hedge contract closely related to spot cotton. I live in Dallas, am familiar with the future markets, and experience has shown me that the change I suggest is what is needed. The cotton exchange is a good thing for the producer if their rules are fair, but as it stands to-day it would be best to put them out of existence, as they have their rules so that they can get the country in and then skin them. If I could talk with you personally, I could give you some valuable pointers. I am a planter and raise on my Texas farms about 1,000 bales of cotton each year. I want the exchange, if run on a fair basis; otherwise want it closed up.

Judge RUFUS HARDY, Senators GORE, CULBERSON, and BAILEY all know me personally.

H. L. SCALES,
Care of Waldorf Hotel.

I never saw him.

Mr. NEVILLE. That is another Mr. Scales altogether. I don't think he has ever been a member of our exchange. Mr. Hubbard tells me he thinks Mr. E. G. Scales was a member. I move that that letter be struck from the record. If he has such an interest in the matter as he says he has he would be here to-day and not writing a letter.

The CHAIRMAN. I can hardly recognize your right to make a motion.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of important business.

SALE OF FUTURES IN COTTON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the general debate closed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me there ought to be a little larger membership in the House to consider the bill, and I therefore make the point that there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it is apparent there is no quorum present, and therefore I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, July 15, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting a report by Commercial Agent Ralph M. Odell, containing result of his investigations of the trade in cotton goods in Turkey (H. Doc. No. 871), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. McGILLICUDDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 20194) to provide payment of rewards for information as to violation of antitrust act of 1890, and amendments thereto, and of the various interstate-commerce acts, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 993), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ESCH, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 25073) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River between Moline, Ill., and Bettendorf, Iowa, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 994), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 6354) to perpetuate and preserve Fort McHenry and the grounds connected therewith as a Government reservation under the control of the Secretary of War and to authorize its partial use as a museum of historic relics, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 995), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. SIMS, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 7195) to authorize the Great Northern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 996), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BOOHER: A bill (H. R. 25749) to provide a permanent supply of coal for the use of the United States Navy and other governmental purposes, to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. AYRES: A bill (H. R. 25750) making an appropriation for the deepening of the channel known as the Bronx River, to reduce the velocity of the tides in said river and its connecting channels, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. BORLAND: A bill (H. R. 25751) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ROBINSON: A bill (H. R. 25752) to amend sections 2380 and 2381, Revised Statutes of the United States; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ESTOPINAL: A bill (H. R. 25753) for the relief of Georgeanna A. Brannan, dependent mother of John Douglas Malone; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. GOEKE: A bill (H. R. 25754) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Jeremiah Swisshelm; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HARTMAN: A bill (H. R. 25755) granting a pension to Ann M. Hammer; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. JACOWAY: A bill (H. R. 25756) for the relief of John Davis; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. LA FOLLETTE: A bill (H. R. 25757) granting a pension to Edward C. McDowell; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 25758) granting an increase of pension to Marmaduke N. Jeffreys; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RUCKER of Colorado: A bill (H. R. 25759) for the relief of Leander Parker; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 25760) granting an increase of pension to John W. Pettee; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: Petition of Karl C. White and 7 others, of Hebron, Ohio, against passage of a parcel-post system; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. AYRES: Memorial of the National Association of Piano Merchants of America, against passage of the Oldfield bill, proposing change in patent laws; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. ESCH: Memorial of the Hebrew Veterans of the War with Spain, of New York City, against passage of bills restricting immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, memorial of the Grand Lodge Free and Accepted Masons, of Milwaukee, Wis., favoring adoption of joint resolution 291, relative to insignia on tombstones in national cemeteries; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ESTOPINAL: Papers to accompany bill for the relief of Georgianna A. Brannan, dependent mother of John D. Malone; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HARTMAN: Petition of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, United Lodge, No. 174, of Altoona, Pa., favoring passage of the workmen's compensation bill (H. R. 20487); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey: Memorial of the Workmen's Sick and Death Benefit Fund of the United States of America, against passage of bills restricting immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. SABATH: Memorial of the Workmen's Sick and Death Benefit Fund of the United States of America and Tow sw Wojcrecka Bi M. S. T. Society, No. 64, of Chicago, Ill., against passage of bills restricting immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, memorial of the Richmond Chamber of Commerce, of Richmond, Va., favoring a revision of our currency system; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. TILSON: Petition of the National Association of Piano Merchants of America, against passage of the Oldfield bill, proposing change in patent laws; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. UNDERHILL: Memorial of the National Association of Piano Merchants of America, against passage of the Oldfield bill, proposing change in the patent laws; to the Committee on Patents.

SENATE.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Saturday, July 6, 1912, when, on request of Mr. OVERMAN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

COTTON GOODS IN TURKEY (H. DOC. NO. 871).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. GALLINGER) laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report by Commercial Agent Ralph M. Odell, containing the result of his investigations of the trade in cotton goods in Turkey, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1152) granting an increase of pension to Mary Bradford Crowninshield.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 220) to grant American citizenship to Eugene Prince.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution (No. 59) providing that the action of the Vice President and President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives in signing the enrolled bill (H. R. 23515) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors be rescinded, and that the Clerk be directed to reenroll the bill, and that in the reenrollment he be authorized to amend the title, etc., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 4913. An act to provide for the payment of drainage assessments on Indian lands in Oklahoma; and

S. 7015. An act to provide American registry for the steamer Damara.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented petitions of the congregation of New Castle Church, of New Castle; Rose Hill Sunday School, of Rose Hill; and of the Elsmere Sunday School, of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware; and of the congregations of the Janes Methodist Episcopal Church, of Germantown; of the Zoar Methodist Episcopal Church, of Philadelphia; and of the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church of Germantown, of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating liquors, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial signed by the presidents of 26 railroads, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called anti-injunction bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CULLOM presented petitions of the Manufacturers and Shippers' Association of Rockford; of Local Union No. 4, International Steel and Copper Plate Printers' Union of North America, of Chicago; of Typographical Union No. 215, of Decatur; and of Local Lodge No. 575, International Boiler Makers and Iron-Ship Builders and Helpers of America, of Villa Grove, all in the State of Illinois, praying for the passage of the so-called injunction-limitation bill, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Trades and Labor Assembly of Belleville, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the better protection of American seamen, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of W. B. Lloyd, secretary of the Illinois State Horticultural Society, of Kinmundy, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation to establish a standard barrel and standard grades for apples when packed in barrels, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Alton, Ill., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation prohibiting the fixing of resale prices on patented goods, which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Chicago, Ill., praying for the establishment of a parcel-post system, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to increase the postal rates on printed matter, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of members of the Association of Commerce, of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the repeal of the law providing for competition among architects for all Federal buildings, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan presented a petition of sundry citizens of Wallace, Mich., praying for the establishment of a parcel-post system, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented memorials signed by 1,280 citizens of Detroit, Mich., and memorials signed by 1,012 citizens of Michigan, remonstrating against the establishment of a department of public health, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ASHURST. I present a resolution adopted by the Coconino Cattle Raisers' Association of Arizona, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That this association is opposed to the changing of the lines of the forest reserve of the Coconino and Tusayan Forest Reservations as now established by the Department of Agriculture, and petition our Senators and Congressmen to use all honorable means to prevent the lines of said reservations being changed; that we favor the lease law of the Government domain, now pending in Congress, and strongly protest against any changes of the lines of the reservations mentioned until said law is passed.

Mr. SANDERS. On Saturday last I presented a memorial of the Anti-Third Term League, with the request that it be printed, but it was not understood at the time. I wish again to present the memorial now with that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That it be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SANDERS. That it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORIAL OF THE NATIONAL ANTI-THIRD TERM LEAGUE.

(By its president, Henry W. Blair.)

WASHINGTON, D. C.

To the Congress of the United States:

Respectfully represents your petitioner, president of the National Anti-Third Term League, of Washington, D. C.

Believing that the framers of the Constitution acted wisely in providing after long and careful deliberation that the term of the President should be for the period of four years, and that the unwritten law which prohibits any person to hold that office a third term should be made a part of the written Constitution, and also believing that there should be no other change therein touching the presidential term, I do respectfully petition that during the present session you will submit to the States for their action a joint resolution proposing to amend Article II of the Constitution, so as to provide that—

"No person who has held the office of President for two terms, or for any part of two terms, whether consecutive or otherwise, shall thereafter be eligible to be chosen to the office of President or Vice President."

Permit me to respectfully ask attention to the following considerations:

1. It should be in the power of the people to secure the services of a good President for two terms or not exceeding eight years in all.

2. There is danger that the Executive power would become too formidable to the other departments of the Government and to the liberties of the people if concentrated in even the most able and patriotic hands for more than two terms. Thus in time the best President may become the most dangerous to the public welfare, for we must never forget that it has been the great struggle of the ages to rescue liberty from the grasp of Executive power.

3. The hope of one reelection will stimulate the President to the wisest and most patriotic endeavor during his first term, whether really safe and fit for the office or otherwise.

4. During his first term the policies and measures and the official organization of administration will naturally be so fashioned that it will be difficult for even an unpatriotic Executive essentially to change them during a second term.

5. Frequent elections, or the power to recall or reelect officials, are essential to the preservation of our institutions. Impeachment is no practicable means of removing bad high officials, and the people ought not to be compelled to endure the burdens and perils of an incompetent or dangerous Chief Magistrate or of a party or policy which they disapprove for more than a single term of not exceeding four years.

6. Too frequent elections are burdensome to the people and produce weariness and indifference in the exercise of the primary duties of sovereignty. At the same time it must be remembered that public order and business stability can only be preserved by elections of such frequency as will secure the immediate removal of bad officials and the repeal of unwise laws.

7. It is difficult and often impossible to formulate and enact into law a wise administrative policy in a single term of four years, while two terms are ample for that purpose; on the other hand, six years of uncontrolled exercise of irresponsible Executive power by a bad, an obstinate, or an incompetent man might be more dangerous than even three terms of four years each, held subject to recall or reelection.

8. There is no precedent, no test of experience in State or Nation for the restriction of the Executive to a single term, long or short, except in the constitution of the Confederate States, which would favor a shorter rather than a longer term.

It is said that eminent statesmen of the Southern Confederacy attributed its fall largely to the six-year term of its Executive, owing to the belief that it could not survive two years more of the measures and policies of the President.

Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, McKinley, Roosevelt, and other Presidents are on record in solemn disapproval of more than two terms, either "in form or substance," for themselves or any other person, and such was the expressed personal judgment and preference of President Grant, who yielded his own to others.

9. A third term initiates revolution in our form of government, leading directly through anarchy to monarchy and despotism. The war of 1861 was waged to divide our country into but two sections, both republics. The third term will insure the utter dissolution of the Union and interminable war before order is restored under a monarch or czar.

There is no evidence that the single term of more than four years would be any better, for the increase of consolidated Executive power would be far greater, proportionately, than the increased length of the term, and in practical experience might prove more harmful than many terms subject to recall every four years.

10. We hold the pledge to a single term, with no specification as to its length, which might be for a year or for life, to be an evasion of the most serious problem in statesmanship involved in the pending presidential election, to wit: Shall we now initiate a revolution in our form of government?

In fact, we already have a powerful monarchist party, which should be so named, based upon a thoroughly organized aristocratic plutocracy, well educated and trained for the last 30 years in all the tastes, forms, and sentiments of foreign countries, seeking titles and social connections abroad rather than at home, until now, both male and female, they are Europeans rather than Americans, and, as a class, with the hope that in the new order of things which they strive for they may have the status of a recognized nobility, they are threatening the peace, if not the existence of the Republic, by their vigorous support, financial, social, and otherwise, of a turbulent aspirant for a third presidential term, which, like the Napoleonic precedents of the first and second empires, is the sure forerunner of an avowed monarchy, unless indeed he, with his avowed worshipers, should prefer to found a theocracy.

Like Absolom, and every other historic demagogue from the dawn of time, he plays his part as a specialist in righteousness, and the only real hope of the people.

And with the monarchists are the most powerful and dangerous monopolies of this or any country.

It is a combination of the present demagogue, the aristocrat, the plutocrat, and the coming despot against our republican form of government. If they take the third term, they will capture the citadel. Then—

"Of what avail
Are plow and sail
If freedom fail?"

Remember 1776 and 1861.

11. The people of this country will ratify no amendment to the Constitution which lengthens by 1 inch the already dangerously "far-flung" executive power; and to attempt it or to risk it by a change of uncertain effect, like the single term, whether long or short, or by a plain first step in revolution like the third term will be to throw away a golden opportunity to render forever impossible the constant recurrence of these desperate attempts of mad ambition to change our Republic into a monarchy, a despotism, or worse. The War of the Revolution was fought to found this Nation and the Civil War to preserve it.

Why throw away the fruits of both?

For these reasons I believe that the term of four years, fixed by the fathers and working well in practice for a century and a quarter, with limitation of eligibility to not exceeding eight years, is the best which can be adopted. And your petitioner will ever pray.

HENRY W. BLAIR,
President of the National Anti-Third Term League,
Colorado Building, Washington, D. C.

THE NATIONAL ANTI-THIRD TERM LEAGUE.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 3, 1912.]

Mr. GALLINGER. On the 16th of May last I presented a petition from ex-Senator Henry W. Blair, president of the Anti-Third Term League, which was printed in the RECORD at my request. I have a brief paper from ex-Senator Blair somewhat explanatory of that petition, and I make the same request—that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered

The matter referred to was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

"We have organized the National Anti-Third Term League because we believe the integrity of our form of government and the preservation of our free institutions are seriously threatened by the proposed candidacy of Mr. Roosevelt for a third term.

"To be sure, he is the only person in the country who could possibly be such a candidate at the present time, for he is the only one who has had a second term. But our special opposition is not to him as a man or on account of the principles or want of principles which he may represent, but to the third term itself.

"We protest against the indorsement of the third term, which is implied by the election of delegates pledged to vote for him as a candidate in the national convention.

"We protest that his name ought not be considered at all in that convention, because he is the third term itself.

"We do not believe that the Republican Party in any State designs to disregard the unwritten law which prohibits either the 'form or the substance' of the third term of the Presidency to any man, just the same 'form and substance' of a third term as that which Mr. Roosevelt renounced and denounced in the most solemn manner.

"We propose to help him redeem that pledge."

This is just what we are and mean.

THE NATIONAL ANTI-THIRD TERM LEAGUE,
HENRY W. BLAIR, President.

Organized May 6, 1912.
Headquarters: Rooms 808–809 Colorado Building.

PLATFORM.

No third term, either "in form or substance," for any man as President of the United States.

INDORSERS.

On the 4th of March next I shall have served three and a half years, and these three and a half years constitute my first term.

The wise custom which limits the President to two terms regards the substance and not the form, and under no circumstances will I be a candidate for or accept another nomination.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

(After his election to the Presidency November, 1904.)

Three years afterwards he said he had not changed and should not change.

Roosevelt is not eligible, and has no moral or legal right to be a candidate at all. He can not be President again for he has had two terms. He has said so himself. There are millions of Republicans who will never vote for him as President again. It is against the unwritten law, which is the strongest of all laws. No candidate or faction or convention can, and the people never will, repeal it. Roosevelt is impossible. George Washington or Abraham Lincoln if now running for President would be defeated. I certainly for one would vote against both, and I am among the most conservative and hidebound of Republicans. I helped to organize the party and have fought for it through thick and thin, both in war and in peace. A third term is revolution. It leads first to anarchy and then to monarchy and slavery, straight to the disfranchisement of both races and the practical reenslavement of the colored man.

It is the first step that costs. Revolutions never go backward.

The third term makes the United States first a Mexico and then a Russia.

But there will be no third term. Mark that.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of Typographical Union No. 152, of Manchester, N. H., praying for the passage of the so-called injunction limitation bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TOWNSEND, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 6408) for the relief of Margaret McQuade, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 919) thereon.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

H. R. 15594. An act for the relief of the heirs of those killed by the explosion at Fort Lafayette, February 19, 1903 (Rept. No. 917); and

H. R. 22863. An act for the relief of H. C. Owens (Rept. No. 918).

Mr. BRYAN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 24699) extending the time for the repayment of certain war-revenue taxes erroneously collected, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 92) providing for the purchase of the home of Thomas Jefferson, at Monticello, Va., reported it without amendment.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 7274) to amend an act entitled "An act to limit the effect of the regulations of commerce between the several States and with foreign countries in certain cases," approved August 8, 1890, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT MEMPHIS, TENN.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. 17239) to authorize the Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment was to add at the end of section 1 the following proviso:

Provided further, That the said Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co. shall not be required to construct the approaches to said bridge necessary to adapt the same as a highway for trolley car, vehicles, travelers on foot, and other like traffic, until there shall be paid, or payment thereof secured to its satisfaction, the sum of $50,000 by parties locally interested in such highway feature of said bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

IMMIGRATION STATION AT BALTIMORE, MD.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Immigration, I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 20501) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange the site heretofore acquired for a United States immigration station at Baltimore, Md., for another suitable site, and to pay, if necessary, out of the appropriation heretofore made for said immigration station an additional sum in accomplishing such exchange; or to sell the present site, the money procured from such sale to revert to the appropriation made for said immigration station, and to purchase another site in lieu thereof, and I ask for its present consideration, as it is important that the measure should be passed now.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations, I report back, with sundry amendments, the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 915) thereon.

I wish to give notice I will endeavor to call up the bill early to-morrow, and that there will be printed copies of the bill and report at the desk within an hour or two. I hope Senators will give it such attention as they wish, so that we may proceed with the bill to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

AMERICAN STEAMER "DOROTHY."

Mr. OVERMAN. From the Committee on Claims I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 22111) for the relief of the Delaware Transportation Co., owner of the American steamer Dorothy, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 9, to strike out the words "for the eastern district of Virginia, the district in which said collision occurred" and insert "in the district in which suit shall be filed by the United States to recover damages and losses by said collision"; on page 2, line 1, to strike out the words "any suits brought" and in lieu to insert "the whole controversy"; on page 2, line 4, before the word "against," to insert the words "either for or"; and to strike out all of section 2 and renumber section 3 to stand as section 2, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the Delaware Transportation Co., owner of the American steamer Dorothy, injured in collision with the United States steam collier Sterling in Chesapeake Bay on December 3, 1911, for and on account of the damage to said steamship Dorothy by reason of said collision, may be submitted to the United States court in the district in which suit shall be filed by the United States to recover damages and losses by said collision, under and in compliance with the rules of said court sitting as a court of admiralty; and the said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of the damages sustained by reason of said collision, if any shall be found to be due, either for or against the United States, upon the same principles and measure of liability, with costs as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, and with the same rights of appeal.

SEC. 2. That should damages be found to be due the said Delaware Transportation Co., as owner of said steamship Dorothy, the amount of the final decree therefor shall be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months from the date of the passage of this act

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. OVERMAN. I report back adversely from the same committee the bill (S. 5221) for the relief of the Delaware Transportation Co., owner of American steamer Dorothy, and I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

OBSERVANCE OF MEMORIAL DAY.

Mr. DU PONT. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 321) relative to the observance of Memorial Day, and I submit a report (No. 916) thereon, which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 916. Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

OBSERVANCE OF MEMORIAL DAY.

Mr. DU PONT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany H. J. Res. 321.

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 321) relative to observance of Memorial Day, having considered the same, reports that, so far as all military posts and stations are concerned, paragraph 449 of the Army Regulations already provides for a much more elaborate and fitting observance of Memorial Day than is provided for by the terms of the joint resolution.

In view of the fact that this joint resolution applies also to all Government establishments under the control of the Navy, as well as to customhouses, quarantine stations, post offices, Indian schools, and other departments of the Government, it is suggested that the resolution be also considered by other committees of the Senate.

Attention is directed to the letter of the Assistant Secretary of War, hereto appended:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 8, 1912.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

SIR: Replying to your communication of the 3d instant inclosing a copy of House joint resolution 321, in relation to observance of Memorial Day (passed by the House of Representatives July 1, 1912), and requesting to be furnished with any information relative to the measure in the possession of the War Department, I have the honor to inform you that we have nothing on file with reference to this resolution.

I will state, however, that Memorial Day is observed throughout the military service in accordance with paragraph 449, Army Regulations, which is based on joint resolution No. 6, February 23, 1887 (24 Stat. L., 644). This paragraph reads as follows:

"449. On Memorial Day, May 30, at all Army posts and stations, the national flag will be displayed at half-staff from sunrise till midday, and immediately before noon the band or field music will play some appropriate air, and the national salute of 21 guns will be fired at 12 m. at all posts and stations provided with artillery. At the conclusion of this memorial tribute, at noon, the flag will be hoisted to the top of the staff and will remain there until sunset. When hoisted to the top of the staff the flag will be saluted by playing one or more patriotic airs.

"In this way fitting testimonial of respect for the heroic dead and honor to their patriotic devotion will be appropriately rendered."

This seems to provide for a more elaborate testimonial than would the joint resolution now before your committee.

The proposed resolution provides for lowering the flag to half-staff from 12 m. to 12.05 p. m., while the present Army Regulations lowers it from sunrise to 12 m., fires the national salute, plays appropriate airs, etc.

Very respectfully,

ROBERT SHAW OLIVER,
Assistant Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the Senator's request concerning the joint resolution?

Mr. DU PONT. Other committees would have control of different parts of the joint resolution as it relates to three or four departments of the Government—the Navy Department, the Interior Department, the Post Office Department, the Quarantine Service, and so forth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator suggest to what committee or committees the joint resolution ought to go?

Mr. DU PONT. I would suggest that it first be referred to the Committee on Finance. I will state that so far as the Committee on Military Affairs is concerned it is entirely unnecessary, as the existing Army Regulations provide for much more elaborate observance of Memorial Day than the joint resolution calls for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware asks that the Committee on Military Affairs be relieved from the further consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. Without objection, the joint resolution will lie on the table for the present.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 7280) granting an increase of pension to Clara V. King; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 7281) granting an increase of pension to Henry H. Woodward (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 7282) granting an increase of pension to Carrie Hitchcock (with accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 7283) granting a pension to Sarah A. Mitchell (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BRADLEY:

A bill (S. 7284) granting an increase of pension to Emanuel Sandusky (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 7285) granting an increase of pension to Harvey Key (with accompanying papers); and (By request): A bill (S. 7286) granting a pension to Mary K. Munoz; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 7287) for the relief of the estate of William Claunch, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. FOSTER:

A bill (S. 7288) to authorize the transfer of First Lieut. Sydney Smith from the retired to the active list of the Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 7289) authorizing the War Department to test upon ships a device for hoisting and lowering lifeboats at sea; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 7290) repealing the act approved March 3, 1911, being "An act to authorize the Greeley-Arizona Irrigation Co. to build a dam across the Colorado River at or near Head Gate Rock, near Parker, in Yuma County, Ariz."; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 7291) for the relief of the heirs of John W. Johnson (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Public Lands.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SWANSON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $80,000 for additional equipment and supplies at the Geological Survey photolithographic plant, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 25069), which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. CATRON submitted an amendment relative to surveys and resurveys of public lands, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 25069), which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (for Mr. GUGGENHEIM) submitted an amendment authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to strike from the plan of permanent construction of highways for the District of Columbia Crittenden Street NW., etc., intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. PERCY submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. BACON submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which were ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey (for Mr. O'GORMAN) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying paper, ordered to lie on the table.

He also (for Mr. O'GORMAN) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE HUDSON RIVER.

Mr. BURTON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 358), which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed 300 copies of House of Representatives Document No. 719, Sixty-first Congress, second session, together with Senate resolution No. 323, Sixty-second Congress, second session, and the response of Hon. Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War, thereto and inclosures transmitted therewith.

REPORT OF THE NATIONAL MONETARY COMMISSION.

Mr. BURTON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 359), which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed 1,000 copies of Senate Document No. 243, being the final report of the National Monetary Commission.

SUPPLY BILLS (S. DOC. NO. 872).

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I gave notice upon Saturday last that I would present, under leave previously granted by the Senate, a certain paper holding, in my opinion, the constitutional right of the House of Representatives to originate supply bills. I now present it for publication in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi desires to have it printed in the RECORD?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And also as a public document?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not had unanimous consent for the latter purpose yet, but I will ask now for unanimous consent to print it as a Senate document.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear the Senator's statement as to what the report is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Some three, four, or five weeks ago, I do not remember how long, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], and I had some little joint debate upon the floor about the constitutional right of the House of Representatives to originate supply bills, the contention on my side being that it was derived from the Constitution and upon the other that it was a mere practice, and was not derived from the Constitution.

I announced at that time that I did not have the books about me to go into it fully, but that, with the permission of the Senate, I would later put in the RECORD a statement of my views as to the authority. It was then agreed between the Senator from Wyoming and the Senator from Massachusetts and me that when I got ready to do that I would give them some notice. I gave the notice last Saturday, saying that I would present it to-day. I have already the permission of the Senate to insert it in the RECORD. I am asking now, if there be no objection, to have it printed as a Senate document.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the article going into the RECORD, but I wish to ask the Senator this question: Is there anything in the report outside of what was then said on the floor of the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the Senator added anything to what was said in the Senate?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; it is all new.

Mr. LODGE. The purpose was to bring in some new matter and show the authority.

Mr. SMOOT. I asked the question because I was going to object to any document being printed if it was only a speech made by a Senator in this body.

Mr. LODGE. It is not a speech at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I withdraw the request.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that if it is outside of a speech that was delivered here, I have not any objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will tell the Senator what it is. It can hardly be called even that. It is a citation of various authorities, a number of the Federalist that was written by Mr. Hamilton, then a speech made by Mr. Madison in the Virginia convention when it was adopting the Constitution, and then a part of a speech of Mr. Iredell, of North Carolina, in the North Carolina convention, who had been a delegate to the national convention. These various matters are connected together by explanatory comments in my hand.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is all new.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the paper will be printed in the RECORD and also as a Senate document.

The paper referred to is as follows:

[Senate Document No. 872, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

THE SUPPLY BILLS.

Article by Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS concerning the constitutional power of the House of Representatives to originate supply bills.

Presented by Mr. WILLIAMS July 15, 1912. Ordered to be printed.

[From Elliot's Proceedings.]

Among the resolutions offered by Mr. Edmund Randolph to the convention May 29, 1787, I find the following:

"Resolved, That each branch ought to possess the right of originating acts; that the National Legislature ought to be empowered to enjoy the legislative right vested in Congress by the Confederation, and, moreover, to legislate in all cases to which the separate States are incompetent or in which the harmony of the United States may be interrupted by the exercise of individual legislation; to negative all laws passed by the several States contravening, in the opinion of the National Legislature, the Articles of Union or any treaty subsisting under the authority of the Union; and to call forth the force of the Union against any member of the Union failing to fulfill its duty under the articles thereof."

From Mr. Charles Pinckney's Draft of a Federal Government I quote the following:

"All money bills of every kind shall originate in the House of Delegates, and shall not be altered by the Senate." (Italics mine.)

Thursday, July 5, 1787. "The committee to whom were referred the eighth resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole House, and so much of the seventh as hath not been decided on," submitted a report, from which I quote the following:

"That all bills for raising or appropriating money, and for fixing the salaries of the officers of the Government of the United States, shall originate in the first branch of the Legislature and shall not be altered or amended by the second branch." (Italics mine.)

On the question as to whether this clause should stand as a part of the report, it passed in the affirmative.

On Monday, July 16, 1787, the question being taken on the whole of the report from the grand committee as amended, it passed in the affirmative. From the report, as passed, I quote the following:

"Resolved, That all bills for raising or appropriating money and for fixing the salaries of the officers of the Government of the United States shall originate in the first branch of the Legislature of the United States, and shall not be altered or amended by the second branch." (Italics mine.)

From the resolutions of the convention, referred on the 23d and 26th of July to a committee of detail (Messrs. Rutledge, Randolph, Gorham, Ellsworth, and Wilson) for the purpose of reporting a constitution, I quote the following:

"X. Resolved, That all bills for raising or appropriating money and for fixing the salaries of the officers of the Government of the United States shall originate in the first branch of the Legislature of the United States, and shall not be altered or amended by the second branch." (Italics again mine.)

From the draft of the constitution, reported by the committee of five, August 6, 1787, I quote as follows:

"SEC. 5. All bills for raising or appropriating money and for fixing the salaries of the officers of the Government shall originate in the House of Representatives, and shall not be altered or amended by the Senate. No money shall be drawn from the Public Treasury but in pursuance of appropriations that shall originate in the House of Representatives." (Italics again mine.)

On Monday, August 13, 1787, it was moved by Mr. Randolph, and seconded, to amend the fifth section of the fourth article to read as follows, namely:

"All bills for raising money for the purposes of revenue, or for appropriating the same, shall originate in the House of Representatives and shall not be altered by the Senate," etc.

NOTE.—Here it is raising money for the purposes of revenue—distinction between raising money and raising revenue.

The question was taken on the first clause of this amendment, which passed in the negative.

On Wednesday, August 15, 1787, it was moved and seconded to amend the twelfth section of the sixth article as follows:

"Each House shall possess the right of originating all bills, except bills for raising money for the purposes of revenue, or for appropriating the same, and for fixing the salaries of the officers of the Government, which shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments, as in other cases."

It was moved and seconded to postpone the consideration of the last amendment, which was passed in the affirmative.

Yeas: New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, 6. Nays: Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, 5.

NOTE.—The small States in the negative.

On Saturday, September 8, 1787, it was moved and seconded to amend the third clause of the report, entered on the Journal of the 5th instant, to read as follows, instead of the twelfth section, sixth article:

"All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments, as on other bills. No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations by law."

Which passed in the affirmative.

No discussion. Evidently nobody thought that it made a difference from previous drafts. Why? Because the phrase "raising revenue" was equivalent to the phrase "raising money and appropriating the same."

Ayes: New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, 9. Nays: Delaware, Maryland, 2.

This time only the two smallest States vote nay. They still stickling for their branch of the National Legislature, the Senate, to have right to originate.

It was moved and seconded to appoint a committee of five "to revise the style of and arrange" the articles agreed to by the House, which passed in the affirmative.

Note what I have italicized in the foregoing sentence.

September 12, 1787. From a revised draft of the Constitution, reported September 12, 1787, by the committee of revision of style, I quote the following from section 7:

"All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments, as on other bills."

As reported by the committee appointed on September 8, to revise the style. No discussion.

Seems still evident that to "raise revenue" meant to raise money and appropriate it.

[From Yates's Minutes.]

On Tuesday, July 3, 1787, the grand committee met. From a motion of Dr. Franklin, which, after some modification, was agreed to and made the basis of a report to the committee, I quote the following:

"That bills for raising or appropriating money and for fixing salaries of the officers of the Government of the United States shall originate in the first branch of the Legislature, and shall not be altered or amended by the second branch; and that no money shall be drawn from the Public Treasury but in pursuance of appropriations to be originated in the first branch."

This is the history of the clause up to its report by the committee on revision and style and arrangement and its adoption by the convention. Meager but to my mind conclusive.

In the consideration of the adoption of the Constitution by the several States in their conventions, I find nothing in the discussions in Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Hampshire, New York, Pennsylvania, or Maryland, which is significant, unless it be because the absence of discussion shows that they notice no variance between the provisions of the Constitution and the several provisions of the several States requiring money or supply bills to originate in the lower houses. When I come to the proceedings of the State of Virginia, however, I find that Mr. Madison, in his argument in advocacy of the adoption of the constitution of the Virginia convention, uses the following language:

"Mr. Chairman, the criticism made by the honorable member is that there is an ambiguity in the words and that it is not clearly ascertained where the origination of money bills may take place. I suppose the first part of the clause is sufficiently expressed to exclude all doubts. The gentlemen who composed the convention divided in opinion concerning the utility of confining this to any particular branch. Whatever it may be in Great Britain, there is sufficient difference between us and them to render it inapplicable to this country. It has always appeared to me to be a matter of no great consequence whether the Senate had a right of originating or proposing amendments to money bills or not. To withhold it from them would create disagreeable disputes. Some American constitutions make no difference. Virginia and South Carolina are, I think, the only States where this power is restrained. In Massachusetts and other States the power of proposing amendments is vested, unquestionably, in their senates. No inconvenience has resulted from it. On the contrary, with respect to South Carolina, this clause is continually a source of disputes. When a bill comes from the other house the senate entirely rejects it, and this causes contentions. When you send a bill to the senate without the power of making any alteration you force them to reject the bill altogether, when it would be necessary and advantageous that it should pass.

"The power of proposing alterations removes this inconvenience and does not appear to me at all objectionable. I should have no objection to their having a right of originating such bills. * * * There is no landmark or constitutional provision in Great Britain which prohibits the House of Lords from intermeddling with money bills, but the House of Commons have established this rule. Let the Lords insist on their having a right to originate them, as they possess great property, as well as the Commons, and are taxed like them. The House of Commons object to their claim, lest they should too lavishly make grants to the Crown and increase the taxes. * * * When a bill is sent with proposed amendments to the House of Representatives, if they find the alterations defective they are not conclusive. The House of Representatives are the judges of their propriety, and the recommendation of the Senate is nothing."

Mr. Madison here uses the words "money bills" as synonymous with "bills to raise revenue." Power to originate important, lest upper house be "too lavish in their grants." Says House of Representatives are "the judges of the propriety of money bills, and the recommendation of the Senate is nothing."

Mr. Grayson, arguing upon the other side, made use of the following language:

"The Senate could strike out every word of the bill except the word 'whereas' or any other introductory word, and might substitute new words of their own."

Friday, July 25, 1788. In the North Carolina convention I find that Mr. Iredell, arguing in favor of the adoption of the Constitution, urged this clause specially, on the ground that the "House of Representatives would be more numerous than the Senate"; that "they will represent the immediate interests of the people," etc., showing that Mr. Iredell regarded the phrase "money bills" as synonymous with the phrase "bills to raise revenue." I find further on that Mr. Iredell, in another speech to the same convention, identifies the right given to the House of Representatives with that already enjoyed by the House of Commons in Great Britain, as is shown by the following quotation of his language:

"Yet the Commons have generally been able to carry everything before them. The circumstance of their representing the great body of the people alone gives them great weight. This weight has great authority added to it by their possessing the right (a right given to the people's representatives in Congress) of exclusively originating money bills."

Note the significance of the parentheses above. To continue:

"The authority over money will do everything. A Government can not be supported without money. Our Representatives may at any time compel the Senate to agree to a reasonable measure by withholding supplies till the measure is consented to. There was a great debate in the convention whether the Senate should have an equal power of originating money bills. It was strongly insisted by some that it should, but at length a majority thought it unadvisable, and the clause was passed as it now stands. I have reason to believe that our representatives had a great share in establishing this excellent regulation, and, in my opinion, they deserve the public thanks for it."

And still later, in reenforcing the same contention, he uses the following language:

"It is contended by that gentleman that the addition of the power of making treaties to the other powers will make the Senate dangerous; that they would be even dangerous to the representatives of the people. The gentleman has not proved this in theory. Whence will he adduce an example to prove it? What passes in England directly disproves his assertion. In that country the representatives of the people are chosen under undue influence, frequently by direct bribery and corruption. They are elected for seven years and many of the members hold offices under the Crown—some during pleasure, others for life. They are also not a genuine representation of the people, but from a change of circumstances a mere shadow of it. Yet, under these disadvantages, they having the sole power of originating money bills, it has been found that the power of the King and lords is much less considerable than theirs. The high prerogatives of the King and the great power and wealth of the lords have been more than once mentioned in the course of the debates. If, under such circumstances, such representatives—mere shadows of representatives—by having the power of the purse and the sacred name of the people to rely upon, are an overmatch for the King and lords, who have such great hereditary qualifications, we may safely conclude that our own Representatives, who will be a genuine representation of the people and having equally the right of originating money bills, will at least be a match for the Senate, possessing qualifications so inferior to those of the House of Lords in England."

In the House of Representatives, March 2, 1797, Mr. Nichols said:

"The power of this House to control appropriations has been settled. It was indeed an absurdity to call a body a legislature and at the same time deny them a control over the public purse. If it were not so, where would be the use of going through the forms of that House with a money bill? The Executive might as well draw upon the Treasury at once for whatever sum he might stand in need of. A doctrine like this would be scouted even in despotic countries."

Note, when he says "that House," he means the House of Representatives, referring back with his relative to his first sentence.

In The Federalist, that great book whose articles were written by Hamilton, Madison, and Jay, in No. 57 of The Federalist, published in the New York Packet on Friday, February 22, 1788, I find language which I shall quote at large, a part of which I have put in italics, as an easy way of bringing it to the attention of the reader. This article, in my opinion, judging by the style of it, was written by Alexander Hamilton. It is more interesting than Jay's style and less diffuse than Mr. Madison's. Next to Mr. Madison himself, Mr. Hamilton perhaps knew better what the Constitutional Convention intended than almost any other one man.

Although in some of the editions of The Federalist this number is attributed to Mr. Madison and in some others to Mr. Hamilton, in a majority of the sources of information, as far as I had time to run it down, the number is attributed to Mr. Madison, but in my opinion, as I said above, the better authority is that Hamilton wrote it and the style is that of Alexander Hamilton.

I quote from the article as follows:

"These considerations seem to afford ample security on this subject and ought alone to satisfy all the doubts and fears which have been indulged with regard to it. Admitting, however, that they should all be insufficient to subdue the unjust policy of the smaller States or their predominant influence in the councils of the Senate a constitutional and infallible resource still remains with the larger States by which they will be able at all times to accomplish their just purposes. The House of Representatives can not only refuse but they alone can propose the supplies requisite for the support of the Government. They, in a word, hold the purse, that powerful instrument by which we behold in the history of the British constitution an infant and humble representation of the people gradually enlarging the sphere of its activity and importance and finally reducing, as far as it seems to have wished, all the overgrown prerogatives of the other branches of the Government. This power over the purse may, in fact, be regarded as the most complete and effectual weapon with which any constitution can arm the immediate representatives of the people for obtaining a redress of every grievance and for carrying into effect every just and salutary measure.

"But will not the House of Representatives be as much interested as the Senate in maintaining the Government in its proper functions, and will they not, therefore, be unwilling to stake its existence or its reputation on the pliancy of the Senate? Or if such a trial of firmness between the two branches were hazarded, would not the one be as likely first to yield as the other? These questions will create no difficulty with those who reflect that in all cases the smaller the number and the more permanent and conspicuous the station of men in power the stronger must be the interest which they will individually feel in whatever concerns the Government. Those who represent the dignity of their country in the eyes of other nations will be particularly sensible to every prospect of public danger or of a dishonorable stagnation in public affairs. To those causes we are to ascribe the continual triumph of the British House of Commons over the other branches of the Government whenever the engine of a money bill has been employed. An absolute inflexibility on the side of the latter, although it could not have failed to involve every department of the State in the general confusion, has neither been apprehended nor experienced. The utmost degree of firmness that can be displayed by the Federal Senate or President will not be more than equal to a resistance in which they will be supported by constitutional and patriotic principles."

You will note that his language is that the "House of Representatives can not only refuse, but they alone can propose the supplies requisite for the support of the Government." He adds, "They, in a word, hold the purse," etc. This demonstrates beyond challenge that in the mind of Mr. Hamilton the phrase "bills to raise revenue" was synonymous with the old English phrase "supply bills," or what we call in American phraseology now "general appropriation bills," as contradistinguished from "special appropriation bills"; that is to say, appropriations for the Army and Navy, executive, legislative, and judicial departments.

Gentlemen have contended that while the practice of the Government was in accordance with my contention, that practice was not founded upon any constitutional warrant. I place against their opinion the opinions of Hamilton and of Madison and of Iredell and of Nicholas (all, if I mistake not, members of the Constitutional Convention), but above all, I place the fact that when the committee on the revision of style reported the present phraseology that it excited no remark and no discussion, which is self-evident proof of the fact that in the opinion of the members of the Constitutional Convention it was a mere change of style or expression and not a change of substance, and that what was meant in their minds by the phrase "bills to raise revenue" was the same thing as is meant by the phrase "bills to raise money and to appropriate the same," or by the phrase "money bills," or by the phrase "supply bills," all of which in their minds at that time were synonymous.

Mr. Madison, than whom no man was better acquainted with the Constitution, in the Virginia convention, constantly uses the words "money bills" and "supply bills" when talking about this clause and the power given the House by it.

Mr. Hamilton uses the words "supplies requisite for the support of the Government."

The confusion of those who in subsequent generations have raised this question—and it is to be remembered that nobody in the generation of the framers of the Constitution did raise it or did try to make the distinction—grows out of their not understanding that a "bill to raise revenue" means a bill to raise revenue for the supply of the executive branch of the Government. There are two sorts of bills for raising revenue for the Government, or, as the English called it, "for carrying on His Majesty's Government." One was by appropriating money already in the Treasury. In this case the money had been raised, but it had not been made Government revenue, and could not be made "revenue" to be disbursed by the executive branch until the legislative branch had appropriated it. When there was no money in the Treasury, then the money had to be "raised" through a bill to appropriate money and a bill to levy taxes, but it did not become "revenue" for the purpose of disbursement by the executive branch solely with the passage of the bill to levy taxes, nor solely with the passage of a bill to issue bonds, but there was needful yet to appropriate the money. The further act necessary to make it revenue for the disbursement of the executive branch was an appropriation. There is no such thing as a "bill to raise revenue" by merely levying a tax in the technical sense in which that phrase was used in the Constitution. There is no such thing as having the legislative branch put money at the disposal of the executive branch except by not only raising the money but by appropriating the same, and raising money and appropriating the same, both taken together, constitute "raising revenue" for the Government.

Even "money in the Treasury" is not a Government "revenue" until rendered disbursable by an appropriation of the money out of the Treasury.

If there were a billion of dollars in the Treasury, it would not be revenue for carrying on the Government—revenue of the Government, revenue in a governmental or constitutional sense—until it had been appropriated. And as the House alone can originate a bill "to raise revenue," it alone can originate a bill to transmute money in the Treasury into revenue.

Revenue—Government revenue—is money in the Treasury rendered available to the Executive for expenditure for "carrying on the Government" by an appropriation.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] says that "not a week passes that we do not originate appropriation bills in the Senate"; that we originate them on claims, on public buildings, etc. I had never contended and do not now contend that the power of the House to originate goes beyond origination of general "supply bills" for the carrying on of the Government or, as it was called in England, carrying on His Majesty's or Her Majesty's Government what were called in England and by Hamilton, Madison, and their contemporaries "money bills." As to special appropriations for many purposes, even the House of Commons in England never claimed exclusive power over them. The Senator adds: "There is, in my opinion, nothing in the Constitution that can be twisted into any such limitation"; that is—a limitation of the power to originate "supply bills" in the House. In this the Senator differs from Mr. Hamilton; he differs from Mr. Madison; he differs from the first Congress that ever met; and he differs, in my opinion, because he has not truly understood the meaning of the phrase "to raise revenue." To raise revenue for what? Why, evidently for disbursement by the Government. To be disbursed by whom? Why, evidently by the Executive. To be appropriated by whom? Evidently by the legislative. Not a dollar in the Treasury can become revenue for carrying on the Government except after two things have been done: First, having the money placed there, and as long as it is there without an appropriation by Congress it is not revenue, it is merely money, because the Constitution provides that no money shall be taken out of the Treasury except in pursuance of an act of Congress; secondly, after being put at the disposal of the Executive for expenditure by appropriation out of the Treasury, then and then only has the money changed its character and become revenue—i. e., money for Executive disbursement by direction of law. As long as it is in the Treasury without appropriation it is inert, dead, and can not be used; it is not governmental revenue, it is not at the behest of the Executive for disbursement. A "bill to raise revenue" is a bill to turn money into an active instrumentality for carrying on the Government.

In 1871 the House adopted a resolution taking exception to a Senate bill which repealed the income tax. The Senate asserted the right to originate bills repealing a tax. Roscoe Conkling, as a Senate conferee, contended for the right. The House conferees refused to assent to the position of the Senate, and pointed out that not only "the right to originate tax and tariff bills, but also appropriation bills" was "conceded to the House of Representatives without dispute until the year 1832, when the right of repealing duties was unsuccessfully asserted by the Senate, and again in 1833 the same thing was attempted, but without success."

You will note that the Senate never until then even asserted any right over general appropriation bills. The resolution recommended by the House conferees was adopted by the House after debate.

Senator Hoar quotes Mr. Webster, who certainly was a very fine constitutional lawyer, as saying: "Whatever the Senate might think, the House is the sole constitutional judge of the extent, meaning, and scope of that constitutional provision," to wit, the constitutional provision to originate "revenue bills." Senator Hoar adds: "Mr. Webster was clearly right."

A very clear discussion of this will be found on page 161 of Mr. McCall's "The Business of Congress." Mr. McCall adds: "In practice the general appropriation bills are now in a sense treated as money bills, and their formation, as well as the formation of those relating to taxation, is given over to the House." I admit that the House has sometimes been lax in this assertion of its right, but whenever the matter has been narrowed down to a crisis and discussed the House has always maintained its right and the Senate has always acquiesced in it. It is idleness to say that this assertion and maintenance and this acquiescence would have taken place without constitutional authority.

Senator Hoar well said: "By a practice as old as the Government itself the constitutional prerogative of the House has been held to apply to all the general appropriation bills."

Reference is directed here to an article entitled "Conduct of business in Congress," published in the North American Review, CXXVII, page 113.

In this connection it is pertinent to inquire that, if I be not right about all this, why is it that the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting estimates for appropriations for the fiscal year is invariably sent to the House and not to the Senate? Why is it not sent to the Senate in the first place, or why not at the same time? Why not addressed to Congress or both Houses? It is sent to the House immediately after the House convenes and is referred to the House Committee on Appropriations. This has been the uniform custom ever since the first Congress met.

Prof. Woodrow Wilson says that the Constitution is silent as to the origination of bills appropriating money. This statement is not correct. The statement begs the question. What are "bills for raising revenue" except bills to make money mobile as a governmental instrumentality—as revenue. Every supply bill is a money bill. Every money bill is a bill to raise revenue. The "revenue" is not "raised" until the appropriation of the money is directed. Raised for what? With us, "to carry on the Government"; in England, "to carry on His Majesty's Government." Who pays out the money to carry on the Government? Why, the Executive, of course. Who raises or provides or supplies the money for the Executive to pay out or to disburse? Why, the legislative branch, equally of course. Who pays your salary or mine? Why, the Executive. And how? By an order upon the Treasury. And in consequence of what? In consequence of an appropriation bill, rendering inert, dead money active, live, Government revenue. You and I are paid by a warrant on the Treasury. We can not pay our own salaries directly to ourselves by ourselves. How is the Executive warranted to give the warrant? Why, by an act of Congress, of course. What is this act? Why, it is a bill to raise supplies—to raise revenue for carrying on the Government. The revenue is not raised for Executive capacity to pay out and therefore not raised as governmental revenue, as an instrumentality in the disbursement whereof the Government is carried on until appropriated by Congress and the purpose of the appropriation designated in an act of Congress. How is revenue raised? I answer, in two ways. What are they? If the money be already in the exchequer or the Treasury here, it is raised for a designated purpose by its appropriation, and if there be no money in the Treasury, then it is raised by levying a tax and at the same time or afterwards appropriating the proceeds of it—by tax bills and appropriation bills.

Much of the confusion has grown out of forgetting that in the early history of the country tax bills and appropriation bills, the conjoint purpose of the two being to raise Government revenue, were provided for in the same act. The Ways and Means Committee of the House levied a tax and at the same time appropriated the tax in one act, which constituted a budget. Later on, when the magnitude of our governmental machinery began to assert itself, the work was divided. Tax bills were left to the Committee on Ways and Means and bills appropriating the proceeds of taxes were left to a new committee, called the Committee on Appropriations. It was not until after this division of labor occurred that any confusion in public thought ever occurred.

Levying a tax and appropriating the money thus raised are two parts of the same act, the object of both of which is to "raise revenue" for carrying on the Government. If you appropriate when there is no money in the Treasury, the Government will not have any revenue. If you levy and collect a tax, but do not appropriate, the Government will still have no revenue. In one and the same bill, or else in two different bills, you must do the two things, which are parts of the same act—first, put money in the Treasury; second, turn the money into Government revenue by appropriating it.

Henry Jones Ford, in his book The Cost of Our National Government (p. 11) says, very properly: "It is a fundamental principle of constitutional government that appropriations are made and expenditures are controlled by the representatives of the people." He adds that "the process of budget making starts with the transmission of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, giving estimates of appropriations required for the public service," and "congressional action on the estimates thus transferred begins in the House of Representatives." (See ibid., p. 14.)

This is a significant recognition of the principle by the practice of the executive department. In fact, throughout our whole history the House has asserted, the Executive has practiced, and the Senate has acquiesced by practice in the general principle—a principle and practice founded on the real and historic meaning of the phrase "bills to raise revenue"—a meaning contemporaneous with the Constitution.

I quote from the same author, page 23: "We began our National Government with a firm and precise principle of budget control; namely, that the House of Representatives held the purse strings. It was the expectation of the framers of the Constitution that the immediate Representatives of the people would control the budget and fix expenditures."

In No. 57 of the Federalist, support was given to this position.

I call the reader's attention to CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 16, part 2, page 949, et seq, being the record of the Forty-eighth Congress, second session. Representative HAMMOND (p. 952), in his reply to what I have called attention to, confuses special appropriations, which are not supply bills, with general appropriations, which are and have always been so treated, both in England and here; and here, as Senator Hoar says, "even from the very origin of the Government."

Mr. HAMMOND likewise confuses the phrase "raising revenue" and the phrase "raising money." Before the Committee on Style changed the verbiage proposed in the constitutional convention, it read: "Bills to raise money and make appropriation of the same." The language "bills to raise revenue" was substituted, and, as far as I can find out, without debate or opposition of any description, showing that the men who had voted for the former phraseology thought that the latter meant the same thing; that is, that a "bill to raise revenue" involved the ideas of "raising money and appropriating the same."

Raising money or putting money into the Treasury is one thing. Making out of money Government revenue is another thing. The money is raised, or collected, or gotten when, by operation of a tax bill, it is covered into the Treasury, but it does not thereupon become revenue. The executive, which alone disburses revenue, can't even touch it. If there were $500,000,000 in the Treasury, no branch of the executive could touch it until the legislative branch had made it revenue by an appropriation bill. The process of raising revenue is not completed until by appropriation it has been made available for carrying on the Government.

In England the means of taxation and the appropriation of money raised by taxes were both carried in the same bill, and such a bill was always indifferently called "a supply bill," "a bill to raise revenue," "a money bill." The committee of the whole of the House of Commons, when moved for that purpose, was called the committee on ways and means, hence the name for our House standing Committee on Ways and Means, which in our early history had jurisdiction over both these parts of the same transaction, to wit, tax bills to put money into the Treasury and appropriation bills directing the use of the money raised by the taxing power; that is, making of the inert money in the Treasury Government revenue to be disbursed by the executive—making it by law available for executive disbursement.

At first, as I have already said, even with us, bills generally did both at the same time, but gradually we found need for two committees in the House acting separately, and out of this grew much of the confusion, which has resulted in the failure to make the distinction between "raising money" and "raising revenue," the distinction between money lying inert in the Treasury and money made active and mobile as a governmental revenue. Governmental revenue is money in the Treasury appropriated and placed at the disposal of the executive for carrying on the Government with more or less or sometimes no specific and detailed direction for its expenditure. The point is that it is not Government revenue until the executive can use it.

In Delaware, Maryland, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, all money bills had to originate in the lower house, and the senate or upper house could amend.

In the colonial constitution of Massachusetts the exact language of the Federal Constitution is used, to wit: That the senate "may propose or concur with amendments."

Blackstone defined "money bills" to be "all bills by which money is directed to be raised." Now, mark that language—"money is directed to be raised"; that is, directed to be made alive; directed to cease to be inert; directed to be lifted into the capacity of carrying on the Government.

The House of Lords, in 1702, 1708, 1719, 1733, and 1736, disputed, as the United States Senate seems to be beginning to dispute here, the power of the House of Commons to originate appropriation bills, and tried, as gentlemen are beginning to try here, to confuse the power of originating tax bills with the power to raise revenue. The Commons always contended that the tax bills and the appropriation bills were part and parcel of the same thing. That contention of the representatives of the people which was successfully carried to a consummation in Great Britain must be carried to the same successful consummation here, or else there is danger of the cessation of all popular control of legislation.

If you will read the proceedings of the Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia very carefully, you will find that the whole argument there was whether the Senate should or should not have the right to amend. There never was one moment spent in discussion as to whether the House should or should not have the right to originate. As distinguished a man as George Washington took a very broad position in favor of giving the Senate the right to amend, or, as the Constitution expresses it, to propose and concur in amendments.

In 1856 Mr. Seward, of New York, said: "We make a revenue bill but once in 10 or 12 years, and these appropriation bills are, in fact, what were intended, I suppose, by the framers of the Constitution as bills of revenue." (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 16, pt. 2, p. 954.) He added: "The practice for these 70 years had been that all appropriations of this character" (and by that he means general appropriation bills) "have originated in the House." He further adds: "The stubborn fact is that the Senate has never originated an appropriation bill" (meaning, of course, a general supply bill), "but has always conceded to the House their origination, and the House of Representatives has never conceded to the Senate the right to originate such bills, but has always insisted upon and has always exercised that right itself." Then, further, he adds, significantly: "The spirit of the Constitution as ascertained from the British constitution and the extemporaneous debates and from the practice for 70 years is stronger than the letter of the Constitution."

Our Constitution provides that no money shall be taken out of the Treasury except in pursuance of law appropriating it. From this it follows, even if the history of the particular language "bills to raise revenue" did not demonstrate it, that money is not revenue wherewith to carry on the Government until its expenditure is directed by law—that is, until it is appropriated. No Government "revenue" has been "raised" until after appropriation, because it can not until then be used by the Executive, who alone can ever use it for carrying on the Government.

Mr. Hammond, who has made out the strongest case ever made against what I am contending for, again confuses the source of revenue with revenue. A tax bill is a source of revenue, but the proceeds of a tax bill are not revenue until rendered available for expenditure by an appropriation. The phrase "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law" is absolutely of the same meaning as if it had been written "No money in the Treasury shall be available to the Executive for disbursement as Government revenue but in consequence of appropriations made by law."

Hammond, by a slip of the tongue, which gives him away, uses the phrase "the revenue of the King"—a perfectly accurate expression. Money in the exchequer in England is not revenue at all until it becomes by appropriation "the revenue of the King," so that the King's Government can pay it out, with or without specific direction. Nor does money in our Treasury become revenue of the king, or revenue of the Executive, or revenue for carrying on the Government, or, in any governmental sense, revenue at all, until it has become in the same way, to wit, by appropriation, the revenue of the Executive. It is the Executive alone in either Government which can disburse money.

In New Jersey, South Carolina, and Virginia, at the time of the Constitution, all money bills must originate in the house of representatives of the State, and could not be even amended in the upper house.

For further study of this question, turn to First Congressional Annals (vol. 1, pp. 592, 593, and 597, and pp. 603, 605, and 617). Turn to the Twenty-second Congressional Debates (Vol. XIV, pt. 1, pp. 1152, 1155, and 522), and Forty-first Congressional Debates (3d sess., Appendix, p. 265), both of which are quoted in note 1 of Hinds' Precedents (vol. 2, p. 951).

In April, 1872, Mr. Dawes, of Massachusetts, reported a resolution citing what occurred in the House on June 25, 1789, during the First Congress, and says: "Madison, Livermore, Gerry, Lawrence, and Tucker contended that the sole right of originating money bills belonged to the House—this was an appropriation bill—but that this clause coerced all appropriation bills, because an appropriation bill was an appropriation of the money raised by the revenue powers of the Government and therefore was included; and since that time, as we all know, the appropriation bills of the Government and general supply bills have originated uniformly in the House of Representatives, with perhaps a single exception, which I will note later, and which failed to pass." (See Hinds' Precedents, vol. 2, p. 958, where the above is set forth.)

The J. Proctor Knott House resolution on February 2, 1871, had no reference to a general appropriation bill. It concerned a bill to "purchase lots adjoining the new building for Bureau of Printing and Engraving." It was in no sense a supply bill. I cite this, because it has been frequently quoted on the other side. But even here the utmost that can be contended is that the House never acted upon the resolution. (See Hinds' Precedents, vol. 2, pp. 971 and 972 top; the views of the minority, ibid., pp. 972, 973.)

Mr. Garfield's language. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 16, pt. 2, p. 954.) Proceedings of the House quoted by Hammond right afterwards prove that Garfield was right about what happened in the House, and the proceedings there do not admit of the explanation attempted to be made by Hammond. The distinction was made in what the House did between general appropriation bills, or supply bills, on the one hand, and special appropriation bills on the other.

If the reader will turn to Webster's Dictionary of 1840 and Worcester's Dictionary of 1846, both of them American, he will find that they bear out exactly the opposite contention to that in behalf of which Hammond quotes them, and that in both cases they confine the meaning of the word "revenue" to "income for public use" and "income for the payment of national expenses."

In no event can money in the Treasury become "income for public use"—that is, be available for the Executive for use—or become available for "the payment of national expenses," except by force of appropriation. These phrases are right, and money not made available by appropriation "for public use" or "for the payment of national expenses" is not Government revenue. It is simply money lying inert in the Treasury. It belongs to the people, of course, but it can not be constitutionally used by "the Government."

Mr. President, if the Senate can constitutionally originate general appropriation bills when money is in the Treasury, then it can do the same thing when there is no money in the Treasury, and thus this body, representing the States and not the people—representing chiefly the smaller States—could force either Federal insolvency—not to be thought of—or else could force the House to levy new or additional taxes and thus force the House to originate tax bills. The two things hang together. If this Senate could originate general supply bills, then it could commit the Government to a course of expenditure that would coerce the House not only into originating but passing tax bills.

As Seward well says, speaking of the long practice under which the House always insisted upon and the Senate always conceded the right of the House to originate general appropriation bills:

"This (practice) could not have been accidental; it was therefore designed. The design and purpose were those of the contemporaries of the Constitution itself. It evinces their understanding of the subject, which was that bills of a general nature for appropriating the public money or for laying of taxes or burdens on the people, direct or indirect in their operation, belonged to the province of the House of Representatives." (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 16, pt. 2, p. 959.)

He added:

"If this power be confined to the one and not to the other—that is, to the levying of taxes to get money but not to its expenditure—then the right is useless, because we change revenue laws so seldom."

This criticism of Seward's is correct, although it was made in view of what occurred later and not of what was in the minds of the framers of the Constitution. I believe it is not too much to say that, in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, a bill to raise revenue was a budget; that is, a bill levying taxes and at the same time appropriating the proceeds of the levy, because such was the contemporaneous practice.

Mr. Sumner, of Massachusetts, said that he regarded the Senate origination of general appropriation bills as "a departure from the spirit of the Constitution." (Ibid.)

Mr. Hinds, in his incomparable work, in a note at the bottom of page 973, volume 2, concerning the question of the right of the House to originate general appropriation or supply bills, says: "But while there has been a dispute as to the theory, there has been no deviation from the practice that the general appropriation bills originate in the House of Representatives." He expressly uses this phrase as contradistinguished from special bills appropriating for single, specific purposes.

It is well to remember in this connection the Hurd resolution of January 13, 1885, which was laid on the table in the House. The fact that it was laid upon the table has been quoted very frequently, but the resolution was directed at Senate bill 398 (The Blair educational bill). It was not a supply bill, but a bill of specific appropriation, not a bill for carrying on the Government any more than a bill making appropriation for a public building would be a bill for carrying on the Government.

WHITE RIVER DAM, ARK.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Some days since the House returned to the Senate a disagreement upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20347) to authorize the Dixie Power Co. to construct a dam across White River at or near Cotter, Ark., and asked for a conference and named the conferees. I wish to move that the Senate agree to the conference asked by the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20347) to authorize the Dixie Power Co. to construct a dam across White River at or near Cotter, Ark. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. NELSON, Mr. BOURNE, and Mr. MARTIN of Virginia conferees on the part of the Senate.

ANNIE R. SCHLEY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4568) granting an increase of pension to Annie R. Schley, which was on page 1, line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one hundred and fifty" and insert "seventy-five."

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House and ask a conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BURNHAM, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. GORE conferees on the part of the Senate.

IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

At 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m. the managers of the impeachment, on the part of the House of Representatives, of Judge Robert W. Archbald appeared below the bar of the Senate, and the Assistant Doorkeeper (C. A. Loeffler) announced their presence as follows:

I have the honor to announce the managers on the part of the House of Representatives to conduct the proceedings in the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, judge of the circuit court and designated a judge of the Commerce Court of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. GALLINGER). The managers on the part of the House will be received, and the Sergeant at Arms will assign them their seats. The managers were thereupon escorted by the Sergeant at Arms, (D. M. Ransdell) to the seats assigned to them in the area in front of the chair.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House of Representatives are here present and ready to present the articles of impeachment which have been preferred by the House of Representatives against Robert W. Archbald, a circuit judge of the United States and designated a judge of the Commerce Court of the United States. The House adopted the following resolution, which I will read to the Senate:

House resolution 626.

THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 11, 1912.

Resolved, That HENRY D. CLAYTON, of Alabama; EDWIN Y. WEBB, of North Carolina; JOHN C. FLOYD, of Arkansas; JOHN W. DAVIS, of West Virginia; JOHN A. STERLING, of Illinois; PAUL HOWLAND, of Ohio; and GEORGE W. NORRIS, of Nebraska, Members of this House, be, and they are hereby, appointed managers to conduct the impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court; that said managers are hereby instructed to appear before the Senate of the United States and at the bar thereof in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States to impeach the said Robert W. Archbald of high crimes and misdemeanors in office and to exhibit to the Senate of the United States the articles of impeachment against said judge which have been agreed upon by this House; and that the said managers do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said Robert W. Archbald to answer said impeachment and demand his impeachment, conviction, and removal from office.

CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Attest:

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk.

By J. C. SOUTH,
Chief Clerk.

Mr. President and Senators, the articles of impeachment are as follows——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before the presentation by the managers on the part of the House of the articles of impeachment, section 2 of the Rules of Procedure and Practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials requires that the Sergeant at Arms shall make proclamation as therein prescribed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms will make proclamation.

The Sergeant at Arms (D. M. Ransdell) made proclamation as follows:

"Hear ye! Hear ye! Hear ye! All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the House of Representatives is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States and designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The articles of impeachment may now be presented.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, the articles of impeachment, which have been adopted by the House of Representatives and which the managers on the part of the House have been directed to present to the Senate, are in the words and figures following:

[Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 11, 1912.

Resolved, That Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit, appointed pursuant to the act of June 18, 1910 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 36, 540), and having duly qualified and having been duly commissioned and designated on the 31st day of January, 1911, to serve for four years in the Commerce Court, be impeached for misbehavior and for high crimes and misdemeanors; and that the evidence heretofore taken by the Committee on the Judiciary, under House resolution 524 sustains 13 articles of impeachment which are hereinafter set out; and that said articles be, and they are hereby, adopted by the House of Representatives, and that the same shall be exhibited to the Senate in the following words and figures, to wit:

Articles of impeachment of the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the name of themselves and of all of the people of the United States of America against Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit, appointed pursuant to the act of June 18, 1910 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 36, 540), and having duly qualified and having been duly commissioned and designated on the 31st day of January, 1911, to serve for four years in the Commerce Court:

ARTICLE 1.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, at Scranton, in the State of Pennsylvania, being a United States circuit judge, and having been duly designated as one of the judges of the United States Commerce Court, and being then and there a judge of the said court, on March 31, 1911, entered into an agreement with one Edward J. Williams whereby the said Robert W. Archbald and the said Edward J. Williams agreed to become partners in the purchase of a certain culm dump, commonly known as the Katydid culm dump, near Moosic, Pa., owned by the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., a corporation, and one John M. Robertson, for the purpose of disposing of said property at a profit. That pursuant to said agreement, and in furtherance thereof, the said Robert W. Archbald, on the 31st day of March, 1911, and at divers other times and at different places, did undertake by correspondence, by personal conferences, and otherwise, to induce and influence, and did induce and influence, the officers of the said Hillside Coal & Iron Co., and of the Erie Railroad Co., a corporation, which owned all of the stock of said coal company, to enter into an agreement with the said Robert W. Archbald and the said Edward J. Williams to sell the interest of the said Hillside Coal & Iron Co. in the Katydid culm dump for a consideration of $4,500. That during the period covering the several negotiations and transactions leading up to the aforesaid agreement the said Robert W. Archbald was a judge of the United States Commerce Court, duly designated and acting as such judge; and at the time aforesaid and during the time the aforesaid negotiations were in progress the said Erie Railroad Co. was a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce and was a party litigant in certain suits, to wit, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 38, and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 39, then pending in the United States Commerce Court; and the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, well knowing these facts, willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly took advantage of his official position as such judge to induce and influence the officials of the said Erie Railroad Co. and the said Hillside Coal & Iron Co., a subsidiary corporation thereof, to enter into a contract with him and the said Edward J. Williams, as aforesaid, for profit to themselves, and that the said Robert W. Archbald, then and there, through the influence exerted by reason of his position as such judge, willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly did induce the officers of said Erie Railroad Co. and of the said Hillside Coal & Iron Co. to enter into said contract for the consideration aforesaid.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of a high crime and misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE 2.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, on the 1st day of August, 1911, was a United States circuit judge, and, having been duly designated as one of the judges of the United States Commerce Court, was then and there a judge of said court.

That at the time aforesaid the Marian Coal Co., a corporation, was the owner of a certain culm bank at Taylor, Pa., and was then and there engaged in the business of washing and shipping coal; that prior to that time the said Marian Coal Co. had filed before the Interstate Commerce Commission a complaint against the Delaware, Lackawanna

& Western Railroad Co. and five other railroad companies as defendants, charging said defendants with discrimination in rates and with excessive charges for the transportation of coal shipped by the said Marian Coal Co. over their respective lines of road; that all of the said defendant companies were common carriers engaged in interstate commerce. That the decision of the said case by the Interstate Commerce Commission at the instance of either party thereto was subject to a review, under the law, by the United States Commerce Court; that one Christopher G. Boland and one William P. Boland were then the principal stockholders of the said Marian Coal Co. and controlled the operation of the same, and they, the said Christopher G. Boland and the said William P. Boland, employed one George M. Watson as an attorney to settle the case then pending as aforesaid in the Interstate Commerce Commission and to sell to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. two-thirds of the stock of the said Marian Coal Co.; and at the time aforesaid there was pending in the United States Commerce Court a certain suit entitled "The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 38," to which suit the said Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. was a party litigant.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, being judge as aforesaid and well knowing these facts, did then and there engage for a consideration to assist the said George M. Watson to settle the aforesaid case then pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission and to sell to the said Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. the said two-thirds of the stock of the said Marian Coal Co., and in pursuance of said engagement the said Robert W. Archbald, on or about the 10th day of August, 1911, and at divers other times and at different places, did undertake, by correspondence, by personal conferences, and otherwise, to induce and influence the officers of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. to enter into an agreement with the said George M. Watson for the settlement of the aforesaid case and the sale of said stock of the Marian Coal Co.; and the said Robert W. Archbald thereby willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly did use his influence as such judge in the attempt to settle said case and to sell said stock of the said Marian Coal Co. to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of a high crime and misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE 3.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, being a United States circuit judge and a judge of the United States Commerce Court, on or about October 1, 1911, did secure from the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., a corporation, which coal company was then and there owned by the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce, and which railroad company was at that time a party litigant in certain suits then pending in the United States Commerce Court, to wit, The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. Interstate Commerce Commission et al., No. 38, and The Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission et al., No. 40, all of which was well known to said Robert W. Archbald, an agreement which permitted said Robert W. Archbald and his associates to lease a culm dump, known as Packer No. 3, near Shenandoah, in the State of Pennsylvania, which said culm dump contained a large amount of coal, to wit, 472,670 tons, and which said culm dump the said Robert W. Archbald and his associates agreed to operate and to ship the product of the same exclusively over the lines of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.; and that the said Robert W. Archbald unlawfully and corruptly did use his official position and influence as such judge to secure from the said coal company the said agreement.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of a misdemeanor in such office.

ARTICLE 4.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, while holding the office of United States circuit judge and being a member of the United States Commerce Court, was and is guilty of gross and improper conduct, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor as said circuit judge and as a member of said Commerce Court in manner and form as follows, to wit: Prior to and on the 4th day of April, 1911, there was pending in said United States Commerce Court the suit of Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission. Said suit was argued and submitted to said United States Commerce Court on the 4th day of April, 1911; that afterwards, to wit, on the 22d day of August, 1911, while said suit was still pending in said court, and before the same had been decided, the said Robert W. Archbald, as a member of said United States Commerce Court, secretly, wrongfully, and unlawfully did write a letter to the attorney for the said Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. requesting said attorney to see one of the witnesses who had testified in said suit on behalf of said company and to get his explanation and interpretation of certain testimony that the said witness had given in said suit, and communicate the same to the said Robert W. Archbald, which request was complied with by said attorney; that afterwards, to wit, on the 10th day of January, 1912, while said suit was still pending, and before the same had been decided by said court, the said Robert W. Archbald, as judge of said court, secretly, wrongfully, and unlawfully again did write to the said attorney that other members of said United States Commerce Court had discovered evidence on file in said suit detrimental to the said railroad company and contrary to the statements and contentions made by the said attorney, and the said Robert W. Archbald, judge of said United States Commerce Court as aforesaid, in said letter requested the said attorney to make to him, the said Robert W. Archbald, an explanation and an answer thereto; and he, the said Robert W. Archbald, as a member of said United States Commerce Court aforesaid, did then and there request and solicit the said attorney for the said railroad company to make and deliver to the said Robert W. Archbald a further argument in support of the contentions of the said attorney so representing the said railroad company, which request was complied with by said attorney, all of which on the part of said Robert W. Archbald was done secretly, wrongfully, and unlawfully, and which was without the knowledge or consent of the said Interstate Commerce Commission or its attorneys.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

ARTICLE 5.

That in the year 1904 one Frederick Warnke, of Scranton, Pa., purchased a two-thirds interest in a lease on certain coal lands owned by the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., located near Lorberry Junction, in said State, and put up a number of improvements thereon and operated a culm dump located on said property for several years thereafter; that operations were carried on at a loss; that said Frederick Warnke thereupon applied to the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. for the mining maps of the said land covered by the said lease, and was informed that the lease under which he claimed had been forfeited two years before it was assigned to him, and his application for said maps was therefore denied; that said Frederick Warnke then made a proposition to George F. Baer, president of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. and president of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., to relinquish any claim that he might have in this property under the said lease provided that the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. would give him an operating lease on what was known as the Lincoln culm bank, located near Lorberry; that said George F. Baer referred said proposition to one W. J. Richards, vice president and general manager of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., for consideration and action; that, the general policy of the said coal company being adverse to the lease of any of its culm banks, the said George F. Baer and the said W. J. Richards declined to make the lease, and the said Frederick Warnke was so advised; that the said Frederick Warnke then made several attempts, through his attorneys and friends, to have the said George F. Baer and the said W. J. Richards reconsider their decision in the premises, but without avail; that on or about November 1, 1911, the said Frederick Warnke called upon Robert W. Archbald, who was then and now is a United States circuit judge, having been duly designated as one of the judges of the United States Commerce Court, and asked him, the said Robert W. Archbald, to intercede in his behalf with the said W. J. Richards; that on November 24, 1911, the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, pursuant to said request, did write a letter to the said W. J. Richards requesting an appointment with the said W. J. Richards; that several days thereafter the said Robert W. Archbald called at the office of the said W. J. Richards to intercede for the said Frederick Warnke; that the said W. J. Richards then and there informed the said Robert W. Archbald that the decision which he had given to the said Warnke must be considered as final, and the said Archbald so informed the said Warnke; that the entire capital stock of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. is owned by the Reading Co., which also owns the entire capital stock of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co., which last-named company is a common carrier engaged in interstate business.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, well knowing all the aforesaid facts, did wrongfully attempt to use his influence as such judge to aid and assist the said Frederick Warnke to secure an operating lease of the said Lincoln culm dump owned by the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., as aforesaid, which lease the officials of the said Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. had theretofore refused to grant, which said fact was also well known to the said Robert W. Archbald.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, shortly after the conclusion of his attempted negotiations with the officers of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. and of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., aforesaid, in behalf of the said Frederick Warnke, and on or about the 31st day of March, 1912, willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly did accept, as a gift, reward, or present, from the said Frederick Warnke, tendered in consideration of favors shown him by said judge in his efforts to secure a settlement and agreement with the said railroad company and the said coal company, and for other favors shown by said judge to the said Frederick Warnke, a certain promissory note for $500 executed by the firm of Warnke & Co., of which the said Frederick Warnke was a member.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as a judge and high crimes and misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE 6.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, being a United States circuit judge and a judge of the United States Commerce Court, on or about the 1st day of December, 1911, did unlawfully, improperly, and corruptly attempt to use his influence as such judge with the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. and the Lehigh Valley Railway Co. to induce the officers of said companies to purchase a certain interest in a tract of coal land containing 800 acres, which interest at said time belonged to certain persons known as the Everhardt heirs.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

ARTICLE 7.

That during the months of October and November, A. D. 1908, there was pending in the United States district court, in the city of Scranton, State of Pennsylvania, over which court Robert W. Archbald was then presiding as the duly appointed judge thereof, a suit or action at law, wherein the old Plymouth Coal Co. was plaintiff and the Equitable Fire & Marine Insurance Co. was defendant. That the said coal company was principally owned and entirely controlled by one W. W. Rissinger, which fact was well known to said Robert W. Archbald; that on or about November 1, 1908, and while said suit was pending, the said Robert W. Archbald and the said W. W. Rissinger wrongfully and corruptly agreed together to purchase stock in a gold-mining scheme in Honduras, Central America, for the pufpose of speculation and profit; that in order to secure the money with which to purchase said stock, the said Rissinger executed his promissory note in the sum of $2,500, payable to Robert W. Archbald and Sophia J. Hutchison, which said note was indorsed then and there by the said Robert W. Archbald, for the purpose of having same discounted for cash; that one of the attorneys for said Rissinger in the trial of said suit was one John T. Lenahan; that on the 23d day of November, 1908, said suit came on for trial before said Robert W. Archbald, judge presiding, and a jury, and after the plaintiff's evidence was presented the defendant insurance company demurred to the sufficiency of said evidence and moved for a nonsuit, and after extended argument by attorneys for both plaintiff and defendant, the said Robert W. Archbald ruled against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiff, and thereupon the defendant proceeded to introduce evidence before the conclusion of which the jury was dismissed and a consent judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $2,500, to be discharged upon the payment of $2,129.63 if paid within 15 days from November 23, 1908, and on the same day judgments were entered in a number of other like suits against different insurance companies, which resulted in the recovery of about $28,000 by the Old Plymouth Coal Co.; that before the expiration of said 15 days the said Rissinger, with the knowledge and consent of said Robert W. Archbald, presented said note to the said John T. Lenahan for discount, which was refused and which was later discounted by a bank and has never been paid.

All of which acts on the part of the said Robert W. Archbald were improper, unbecoming, and constituted misbehavior in his said office as judge, and render him guilty of a misdemeanor.

ARTICLE 8.

That during the summer and fall of the year 1909 there was pending in the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, in the city of Scranton, over which court the said Robert W.

Archbald was then and there presiding as the duly appointed judge thereof, a civil action wherein the Marian Coal Co. was defendant, which action involved a large sum of money, and which defendant coal company was principally owned and controlled by one Christopher G. Boland and one William P. Boland, all of which was well known to said Robert W. Archbald; and while said suit was so pending the said Robert W. Archbald drew a note for $500, payable to himself, and which note was signed by one John Henry Jones and indorsed by the said Robert W. Archbald, and then and there during the pendency of said suit as aforesaid the said Robert W. Archbald wrongfully agreed and consented that the said note should be presented to the said Christopher G. Boland and the said William P. Boland, or one of them, for the purpose of having the said note discounted, corruptly intending that his name on said note would coerce and induce the said Christopher G. Boland and the said William P. Boland, or one of them, to discount the same because of the said Robert W. Archbald's position as judge and because the said Bolands were at that time litigants in his said court.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of gross misconduct in his office as judge, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor in his said office as judge.

ARTICLE 9.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, of the city of Scranton and State of Pennsylvania, on or about November 1, 1909, being then and there a United States district judge in and for the middle district of Pennsylvania, in the city of Scranton and State aforesaid, did draw a note in his own proper handwriting, payable to himself, in the sum of $500, which said note was signed by one John Henry Jones, which said note the said Robert W. Archbald indorsed for the purpose of securing the sum of $500, and the said Robert W. Archbald, well knowing that his indorsement would not secure money in the usual commercial channels, then and there wrongfully did permit the said John Henry Jones to present said note for discount, at his law office, to one C. H. Von Storch, attorney at law and practitioner in said district court, which said Von Storch, a short time prior thereto, was a party defendant in a suit in the said district court presided over by the said Robert W. Archbald, which said suit was decided in favor of the said Von Storch upon a ruling by the said Robert W. Archbald; and when the said note was presented to the said Von Storch for discount, as aforesaid, the said Robert W. Archbald wrongfully and improperly used his influence as such judge to induce the said Von Storch to discount same; that the said note was then and there discounted by the said Von Storch, and the same has never been paid but is still due and owing.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of gross misconduct in his said office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor in his said office as judge.

ARTICLE 10.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, while holding the office of United States district judge, in and for the middle district of the State of Pennsylvania, on or about the 1st day of May, 1910, wrongfully and unlawfully did accept and receive a large sum of money, the exact amount of which is unknown to the House of Representatives, from one Henry W. Cannon; that said money so given by the said Henry W. Cannon and so unlawfully and wrongfully received and accepted by the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, was for the purpose of defraying the expenses of a pleasure trip of the said Robert W. Archbald to Europe; that the said Henry W. Cannon, at the time of the giving of said money and the receipt thereof by the said Robert W. Archbald, was a stockholder and officer in various and diverse interstate railway corporations, to wit: A director in the Great Northern Railway, a director in the Lake Erie & Western Railroad Co., and a director in the Fort Wayne, Cincinnati & Louisville Railroad Co.; that the said Henry W. Cannon was president and chairman of the board of directors of the Pacific Coast Co., a corporation which owned the entire capital stock of the Columbia & Puget Sound Railroad Co., the Pacific Coast Railway Co., the Pacific Coast Steamship Co., and various other corporations engaged in the mining of coal and in the development of agricultural and timber land in various parts of the United States; that the acceptance by the said Robert W. Archbald, while holding said office of United States district judge, of said favors from an officer and official of the said corporations, any of which in the due course of business was liable to be interested in litigation pending in the said court over which he presided as such judge, was improper and had a tendency to and did bring his said office of district judge into disrepute.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office ,and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

ARTICLE 11.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, while holding the office of United States district judge in and for the middle district of the State of Pennsylvania, did, on or about the 1st day of May, 1910, wrongfully and unlawfully accept and receive a sum of money in excess of $500, which sum of money was contributed and given to the said Robert W. Archbald by various attorneys who were practitioners in the said court presided over by the said Robert W. Archbald; that said money was raised by subscription and solicitation from said attorneys by two of the officers of said court, to wit, Edward R. W. Searle, clerk of said court, and J. B. Woodward, jury commissioner of said court, both the said Edward R. W. Searle and the said J. B. Woodward having been appointed to the said positions by the said Robert W. Archbald, judge aforesaid.

Wherefore said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

ARTICLE 12.

That on the 9th day of April, 1901, and for a long time prior thereto, one J. B. Woodward was a general attorney for the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., a corporation and common carrier doing a general railroad business; that on said day the said Robert W. Archbald, being then and there a United States district judge in and for the middle district of Pennsylvania, and while acting as such judge, did appoint the said J. B. Woodward as a jury commissioner in and for said judicial district, and the said J. B. Woodward, by virtue of said appointment and with the continued consent and approval of the said Robert W. Archbald, held such office and performed all the duties pertaining thereto during all the time that the said Robert W. Archbald held said office of United States district judge, and that during all of said time the said J. B. Woodward continued to act as a general attorney for the said Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.; all of which was at all times well known to the said Robert W. Archbald.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

That Robert W. Archbald, on the 29th day of March, 1901, was duly appointed United States district judge for the middle district of Pennsylvania and held such office until the 31st day of January, 1911, on which last-named date he was duly appointed a United States circuit judge and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court.

That during the time in which the said Robert W. Archbald has acted as such United States district judge and judge of the United States Commerce Court he, the said Robert W. Archbald, at divers times and places, has sought wrongfully to obtain credit from and through certain persons who were interested in the result of suits then pending and suits that had been pending in the court over which he presided as judge of the district court, and in suits pending in the United States Commerce Court, of which the said Robert W. Archbald is a member.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, being United States circuit judge and being then and there a judge of the United States Commerce Court, at Scranton, in the State of Pennsylvania, on the 31st day of March, 1911, and at divers other times and places, did undertake to carry on a general business for speculation and profit in the purchase and sale of culm dumps, coal lands, and other coal properties, and for a valuable consideration to compromise litigation pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in the furtherance of his efforts to compromise such litigation and of his speculations in coal properties, willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly did use his influence as a judge of the said United States Commerce Court to induce the officers of the Erie Railroad Co., the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co., the Lackawanna & Wyoming Valley Railroad Co., and other railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce, respectively, to enter into various and divers contracts and agreements in which he was then and there financially interested with divers persons, to wit, Edward J. Williams, John Henry Jones, Thomas H. Jones, George M. Watson, and others, without disclosing his said interest therein on the face of the contract, but which interest was well known to the officers and agents of said railroad companies.

That the said Robert W. Archbald did not invest any money or other thing of value in consideration of any interest acquired or sought to be acquired by him in securing or in attempting to secure such contracts or agreements or properties as aforesaid, but used his influence as such judge with the contracting parties thereto, and received an interest in said contracts, agreements, and properties in consideration of such influence in aiding and assisting in securing same.

That the said several railroad companies were and are engaged in interstate commerce, and at the time of the execution of the several contracts and agreements aforesaid and of entering into negotiations looking to such agreements had divers suits pending in the United States Commerce Court, and that the conduct and efforts of the said Robert W. Archbald in endeavoring to secure and in securing such contracts and agreements from said railroad companies was continuous and persistent from the said 31st day of March, 1911, to about the 15th day of April, 1912.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of misdemeanors in office.

CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Attest:

SOUTH TRIMBLE, Clerk,
By J. C. SOUTH, Chief Clerk.

And, Mr. President, the House of Representatives by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles of accusation or impeachment against the said Robert W. Archbald, a circuit judge of the United States and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the articles preferred against him, and of offering proof to the same and every part thereof, and to all and every other article of accusation or impeachment which shall be exhibited by them as the case shall require, do demand that the said Robert W. Archbald may be put to answer the high crimes and misdemeanors in office which have been charged against him in the articles which have been exhibited to the Senate, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as may be agreeable to law and justice.

Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, in pursuance of the action of the House of Representatives by the adoption of the resolutions and articles of impeachment, which have just been read to the Senate, do now demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said Robert W. Archbald to answer said impeachment, and do now demand his impeachment, conviction, and removal from office.

The articles of impeachment were handed to the Secretary of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee of the House of Representatives, the Chair begs to assure you that the Senate will take order in the matter of the impeachment of Judge Archbald and communicate its action to the House of Representatives.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, in behalf of the House of Representatives the managers of the House beg to thank the Presiding Officer and the Senate for the courtesy extended to the managers upon the part of the House of Representatives.

The managers thereupon withdrew from the Chamber.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 360) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the message of the House of Representatives relating to the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald be referred to a select committee to consist of five Senators to be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announces the following as the committee: The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I submit the following order, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be read.

The order was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the articles of impeachment presented against Robert W. Archbald be printed for the use of the Senate. (S. Doc. No. 874.)

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, under the provisions for the conduct of impeachment trials it is necessary, I understand, that we should arrange for taking up these articles to-morrow at 1 o'clock. We have no choice in the matter whatever. I did not catch in either of the resolutions any provision for that.

Mr. BACON. I would say in reply to the suggestion of the Senator that the resolution offered by the Senator from Wyoming is an exact copy of the resolution which under similar circumstances was offered in the case of the impeachment of Judge Swayne, and while the specification is not made in the resolution to which the Senator from Massachusetts has alluded the action of the committee did embrace the particular matters the Senator has in mind, and I presume that that would be the action of the committee in this case. In other words, while the reading of the resolution is one which relates simply to the reference of the articles of impeachment, that committee did on the former occasion go forward and make preparation in the way of the presentation of the orders, and so forth, which were necessary to prepare for the trial, in arranging for the oath to be administered to Senators and the necessary orders to bring the matter at issue after the proper notice had been served upon the officer who is charged with high crimes and misdemeanors.

I thought it proper to mention to the Senator from Wyoming, who had shown me before he offered it the resolution which he had prepared, and both he and I concurred in the opinion that the resolution having been identical in the former case and having been acted on by the Senate, it would be better probably to follow the precedent in that instance.

Mr. LODGE. I do not question at all the propriety of the resolution appointing the committee. I have not, of course, the record before me showing what was done previously, and as to the action taken before in regard to what is required under the rule, that we shall act not later than 1 o'clock on the following day.

Mr. BACON. This does not in any manner interfere with what the rule contemplates.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The record in the Swayne case shows that a resolution similar to that presented by the Senator from Wyoming was submitted to the Senate and was adopted prior to the submission of the articles of impeachment.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the whole confusion arises out of the fact that this has not been the procedure heretofore. Heretofore the committee of the House came and notified the Senate that they would prepare articles of impeachment, and subsequently did come to exhibit the articles. The Senator from Georgia is exactly right, because when the Senate does convene to-morrow at 1 o'clock for this purpose the committee will have such order ready as the Senate ought to make.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator will permit me, the resolution presented by the Senator from Wyoming was presented with a full knowledge of the difference between this case and the Swayne case. The Senator from Wyoming can not see where it creates any difficulty whatever.

Mr. BAILEY. None at all.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The resolution, in the judgment of the Senator from Wyoming, is proper at any stage of the proceedings until the Senate acts upon the resolution of the House.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will permit me, if some such resolution as the Senator from Wyoming has introduced had not been introduced and adopted, we would meet here at 1 o'clock to-morrow and nobody would be prepared for properly taking the procedure indicated in the rule.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is the position of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire a rereading of the resolution. I recognize the propriety of some one preparing the necessary order or resolution, but I did not gather from the resolution that such was the purpose or function of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again read.

The Secretary again read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the message of the House of Representatives relating to the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald be referred to a select committee, to consist of five Senators to be appointed by the President pro tempore.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems to me that the articles of impeachment under that resolution would go to the committee with neither direction for a report nor any order as to this procedure.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; if the Senator will allow me, the resolution refers not at all to the articles of impeachment. The resolution refers to the message that came from the House on Saturday last.

Mr. CUMMINS. That will obviate the objection I had in mind, because I do not believe the Senate has any power to commit the articles of impeachment to any committee.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course not.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I now desire to call attention to the point I made before, that after the presentation of the articles of impeachment, which is what has happened, on the Swayne case, the Senate first made the order which has just been made on the motion of the Senate from Utah to print the articles of impeachment for the use of the Senate. They then made an order "that at 2 o'clock this afternoon the Senate will proceed." It seems that under the rule we ought to make an order as to when we shall proceed, which must be not later than 1 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BAILEY. In the absence of making any order, we would proceed under the rule at 1 o'clock.

Mr. LODGE. The Senate would proceed automatically at 1 o'clock.

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me it would be rather better to proceed by agreement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, with all due deference to the suggestion made by the Senator from Texas, it does seem to me that the appointment of this committee is absolutely unnecessary. When the committee was appointed in the Swayne case it was, as I have already stated, at an entirely different stage of the proceeding.

Mr. BACON. This is a very important matter and I hope the Senator will speak loud enough for us to hear what he says.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very well. The message which is referred to this committee, as I understand the statement made by the Senator from Wyoming, is that which was received by the Senate on Saturday. Now, that message was disposed of upon the motion of the Senator from Georgia. We adopted an order which reads:

That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to receive the managers appointed by the House for the purpose of exhibiting articles of impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court, agreeably to the notice communicated to the Senate.

So the Senate has taken action upon that message. Nothing remains for the committee to do. The articles of impeachment, in pursuance of the order adopted by the Senate on Saturday, have been exhibited to the Senate, and they are now before the Senate for consideration. Article III——

Mr. BAILEY. No; not until we take the oath of office.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly; we must take the oath of office before we proceed.

Article III of the rules relating to the trial of impeachment cases provides that—

Upon such articles being presented to the Senate, the Senate shall, at 1 o'clock afternoon of the day (Sunday excepted) following such presentation, or sooner if ordered by the Senate, proceed to the consideration of such articles, and shall continue in session from day to day (Sundays excepted) after the trial shall commence (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate) until final judgment shall be rendered, etc.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In just a moment. When the articles of impeachment have been presented, and they have been presented to-day, nothing remains for the Senate to do except to proceed to the consideration of those articles on the following day at 1 o'clock, unless an order is adopted to the contrary.

So there is absolutely nothing for this committee to consider. The rules prescribe exactly what the Senate shall do. It seems to me that the proper course is either to adjourn, under the rule, which will authorize us automatically to meet again at 1 o'clock to-morrow for the purpose of considering these articles or to adopt an order that that course be taken. I have prepared an order to that effect, and at the proper time I will offer it.

I now yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Under the Constitution when the Senate comes to act upon this matter it must act as a court. The Senate has no power to take action with respect to any matter material to the question presented by the impeachment. Therefore these proceedings on the part of the Senate seem to me to be idle. There is no power to act until the Senate convenes as a court and its members are sworn. Then such action may be taken as is necessary.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That occurs to-morrow.

Mr. WORKS. Of course that occurs to-morrow. No action is necessary on the part of the Senate until to-morrow.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me to call attention to the language of Rule III, it provides, as I have already stated, "that upon the following day, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, the Senate shall meet for the purpose." and so forth, and then the rule proceeds:

> Before proceeding to the consideration of the articles of impeachment the Presiding Officer shall administer the oath hereinafter provided to the Members of the Senate then present and to the other Members of the Senate as they shall appear, whose duty it shall be to take the same.

So, as I understand it, to-morrow at 1 o'clock before the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the articles of impeachment, it is the duty of the Presiding Officer to administer the oath of office. That having been done the Senate is constituted a court for the trial of this impeachment case.

Mr. WORKS. And it has no power to act as a court until then.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It has no power to act as a court until that time.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I offer the following order, and ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. BACON. Before that is done, I hope the Senator will permit me——

Mr. LODGE. Let it be read.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator permit it to be read?

Mr. BACON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

> Ordered, That at 1 o'clock p. m. July 16, 1912, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, a United States circuit judge and a member of the Commerce Court, presented by the House of Representatives this day.

Mr. BAILEY. That is an exact transcript of the rule now.

Mr. BACON. It is probably proper that I should make some statement as to the circumstances under which I offered the order which was adopted by the Senate on Saturday.

The Senator from Texas has correctly stated the fact that the order of procedure adopted by the House in this instance is not exactly as it was in the case of the impeachment of Judge Swayne. In that case there was a method pursued under which the committee appointed on the part of the House appeared and announced the fact to the Senate that it appeared in obedience to the order of the House, and the House had ordered an impeachment, and at a future time would exhibit articles of impeachment. In this instance, there has been delay on account of monopoly of the time of the Senate in the consideration of the election case of Mr. Lorimer. The House determined that they would refrain from that formality, and that they would send notice to the Senate of the fact that the impeachment had been ordered and a resolution had been adopted to that effect, which resolution was communicated by the Clerk of the House.

It was the desire of the managers, if practicable, to present those articles on Saturday afternoon. They did not know, however, at what time the Senate would finish the consideration of the case of Mr. Lorimer, as that could not be anticipated with certainty. The House desired that it should be notified as promptly as possible that the Senate was ready to receive the managers appointed by the House for the purpose of conducting the impeachment trial. Therefore it was at the request of the board of managers that I offered the resolution, their intention being, if time permitted, to appear immediately on Saturday afternoon. That accounts for the variation of the method which was pursued in the case of the impeachment of Judge Swayne so far as the preliminary steps were concerned.

As to the order taken—I am speaking of the resolution offered this morning by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]—I do not know whether an order identical in terms was adopted in prior cases of impeachment, but I am quite familiar with and I recollect very distinctly what was done in the adoption of that resolution in the case of the impeachment of Judge Swayne. The purpose of the resolution was in that case, and I presume it is in this case, to appoint a committee who should suggest the steps in the procedure, the orders to be taken, and so forth. It is manifestly necessary that there should be somebody charged with that responsibility in order that the various steps to be taken may be anticipated and provided for.

So far as the membership of that committee is concerned, I am sure that I reflect the sentiments and feelings of the other Members by saying that I am perfectly willing that that duty shall be conferred upon other Senators, but it must be conferred on somebody. It is not proper, it is not conducive to regular and orderly procedure that the question of what papers shall be presented and the question of what particular methods shall be pursued shall be left to the irregular and unconcerted action of different Senators.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. WORKS. Does not the Senator from Georgia think that this committee should be appointed after the Senate becomes the court and has this matter within its jurisdiction?

Mr. BACON. I think not, for the reason that this committee will not exercise any function except the function of taking the necessary steps to see that the proper procedure is inaugurated.

Mr. WORKS. Well, the committee could take no action that would be binding upon the court as such when it was organized.

Mr. BACON. Of course not. The committee could not summon Judge Archbald; the committee could not do anything except suggest to the Senate what it ought to do.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will permit me, one of the very things it ought to do would be to have the subpœna ready.

Mr. BACON. Of course it can simply prepare things, but it can do nothing by its own authority; it can do nothing except suggest and prepare for the Senate. Then it is for the Senate to say whether or not it will approve of the suggestion.

Mr. WORKS. It seems to me that that is just as much a function of the court as any other duty that it has to perform—to prepare for the trial of the case after it becomes a court.

Mr. BAILEY. How often does the district attorney prepare an order in advance and bring it into court?

Mr. WORKS. But the district attorney in this case is not the Senate; it is the House of Representatives.

Mr. BACON. There is no authority for this committee except to suggest. Everything that is done must be done by the Senate. This committee can do nothing but consider what is, in its opinion, a proper thing to be suggested to the Senate. When suggested to the Senate, it is for the Senate to approve of the suggestion or to disapprove of it and take further action

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact that the rules which have already been adopted are quite specific as to the steps that are to be taken. The form of summons to be issued to the respondent is particularly prescribed by the rules. The procedure, as it seems to me, is perfectly plain and simple. Besides that, this committee is not appointed to do any of the things about which the Senator from Georgia has spoken. This committee has been created and has had referred to it the message of the House of Representatives, of which the Senate has already disposed. The committee has no other function under the order which has been adopted.

Mr. BACON. That is——

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will permit me further, as I understand, at 1 o'clock to-morrow the Members of the Senate are sworn. Then the Senate is organized as a court of impeachment; directions are given for the summoning of this respondent; the summons is issued directing him to appear at a certain time; and the procedure thereafter is laid down with a great deal of particularity in the rules.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I want to relieve the situation a little. For some reason—I do not know why—there seems to be a desire on the part of some of the Senators to depart from the course that was pursued in the last impeachment trial. Of course, in presenting the resolution, the mover of the resolution had no object in view whatever except to expedite the matter and to proceed in the ordinary way as we have done before. It seems to me that we shall immediately fall into difficulties if we proceed as a court and have all these matters of ordinary routine coming up for action of the entire court, or the entire Senate, when they might well be prepared and sifted out by a committee. Inasmuch as there seems to be a misunderstanding, Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the committee was appointed be reconsidered.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the Senator will not do that, because——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BACON. No; go ahead.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, we shall meet here to-morrow with absolutely no procedure properly mapped out. No Senator will take it upon himself to do it. Consequently we shall have to appoint somebody to-morrow to do what this committee would have ready for our hands to-morrow at 1 o'clock.

Mr. President, the procedure indicated here is not only that in the Swayne case, but it is the same as in all the other impeachments; it is the same as that pursued in the impeachment of the President and of the Secretary of War, those differing, as the Swayne case did, in the fact that here there was no antecedent notice of the House that it had adopted and would subsequently exhibit articles of impeachment.

It seems to me that to-morrow when we meet, articles of impeachment already having been exhibited, Senators will be sworn, as the Constitution requires we must be, and we must then not only give notice to the respondent to appear and defend himself, but our rules, if I am not mistaken, require a copy of those articles of impeachment to be presented to the accused. Who will have them ready unless there is a committee? The rule provides that such things shall be done, but it does not provide who shall do them.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. ROOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senators will pardon me a moment, I shall hear them both. I will first hear the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BACON. I want to suggest to the Senator from Texas that I have never yielded the floor. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] interrupted me——

Mr. BAILEY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest to the Senator from Texas that we wait until the Senator from Georgia has concluded, and then we shall have an opportunity to go on.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I yield the floor altogether, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the fact that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] had the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. I must respectfully submit that the Chair is mistaken, because the Chair recognized, as I understood, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] to move a reconsideration of the vote by which this committee was appointed; and I took the floor upon that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas is mistaken as to that. The Chair did not take any action on the motion of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. BAILEY. The Chair had not stated it, but the Senator from Wyoming had submitted that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. BAILEY. But that is immaterial, as I understand. The Senator from Georgia, of course, and every other Senator will have time to present his views. Now I will hear what the Senator from Massachusetts has to say.

Mr. LODGE. I was only going to suggest to the Senator that I have looked back over these cases, and I find in every instance that the committee appointed by the Senate was appointed to have referred to them the message of the House of Representatives announcing that they were about to send a committee such as we have had here from the House to-day. No such committee was ever appointed after the articles of impeachment were exhibited.

Mr. BAILEY. I have not examined as to that, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. It was the same in the Andrew Johnson case, which I have before me.

Mr. BAILEY. In the case of Andrew Johnson they first adopted these rules which are now the Senate rules; but when Johnson was impeached there were no rules.

Mr. LODGE. That is true. That committee reported the rules under which the Senate proceeded, and those rules are now part of our regular rules.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, Mr. President, I am not so sure that the Senate sitting as a Senate can go beyond the time when the Senate resolves itself into a court, and some of these things must be done after the Senate resolves itself into a court; for instance, the subpœna and notice.

The Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] was not exactly fortunate in replying to the suggestion I made that the court often invites the district attorney to prepare an order. If it is permissible for a court to say to a district attorney or to counsel of a suitor, "Prepare your order and bring it here"—of course, it is a nullity until the court approves it and enters it upon the record, but if that is permissible in the case of a district attorney, certainly it is still more permissible for the Senate, when sitting as a court, to receive from its committee such suggestions as that committee may think wise and proper to make. Now I will hear the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of suggesting to the Senator from Texas a consideration which seems to me to arise upon the face of the rules; and that is, whether this whole subject is not disposed of by the rules to be placed in the hands and under the authority of the Presiding Officer. Rule V provides:

> The Presiding Officer shall have power to make and issue, by himself or by the Secretary of the Senate, all orders, mandates, writs, and precepts authorized by these rules or by the Senate, and to make and enforce such other regulations and orders in the premises as the Senate may authorize or provide.

And Rule VII provides:

> The Presiding Officer of the Senate shall direct all necessary preparations in the Senate Chamber, and the presiding officer on the trial shall direct all the forms of proceedings while the Senate is sitting for the purpose of trying an impeachment, and all forms during the trial not otherwise specially provided for.

It seems to me that those rules intended to put in the power of the Presiding Officer the authority, and to impose upon him the duty, of doing substantially what the Senator from Texas is looking to a committee to do; and that the Presiding Officer can, of course, call to his assistance the very Senators named in the resolution or any other Members of the Senate to advise with him regarding what he shall do under this authority.

Mr. BAILEY. That is all true, Mr. President, and if it had been a question of whether or not the committee should be appointed I would not have regarded that as vital; but the committee has been appointed, and it seems to me that it can not possibly do any harm. It may facilitate the disposition of that business and will do so. I have no doubt that the committee will have the writ ready, and, while the writ itself is a mere matter of form, the articles of impeachment must be put in shape to be transmitted by the presiding officer to the accused. That requires some attention.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. I suppose "the presiding officer" referred to in the rule read by the Senator from New York means the presiding officer of the court, and not the Presiding Officer of the Senate?

Mr. BAILEY. That is undoubtedly true.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, just to show how widely mistaken Senators are as to the effect of this resolution, if the same effect is to be given to it as was given to it on the former occasion, I am going to ask the attention of Senators to what was done under that form of resolution in the Swayne case. That resolution was offered by Mr. Platt, a Senator from Connecticut, who was then chairman of the Judiciary Committee. Under that resolution—and I hope I may have the attention of Senators, because I think what I am about to say and what I am about to read will throw some light upon this matter—under that resolution a committee was appointed consisting of Messrs. Platt, of Connecticut, CLARK of Wyoming, Fairbanks, BACON, and Pettus. That was a resolution identical in terms with the present resolution. The present resolution has been copied from it, the only variation being in the name of the officer against whom articles of impeachment are presented. Under that resolution the committee then appointed was, by the general regulation of the Senate, charged with the preparation of such orders as it was deemed necessary the Senate should adopt in the process of trial. Some of the orders were adopted before the court was convened and others after the court was convened. In each instance, of course, they were orders which were subject entirely to the approval and confirmation of the Senate.

Mr. Platt, of Connecticut, in a subsequent part of the proceedings, was selected as the presiding officer, upon motion of Mr.

Spooner, then Senator from Wisconsin, after the then President pro tempore had signified his desire that some other Senator should be substituted for him. Up to the time that Mr. Platt was selected, he offered every order that was offered in the Senate under which the proceeding was subsequently had. The committee met regularly for the purpose of considering what was necessary to be done, so that the proceedings should be orderly, properly, and most expeditiously conducted. When that committee had considered what orders were necessary, and agreed upon them, in each instance the order was handed to some member of the committee and it was by him presented to the Senate. The Senate then passed upon the question whether it approved of the order which was thus suggested by the committee.

Now I am going to read some of these orders, to show the manner in which this proceeding was had.

The Senator from Utah suggests that as the resolution relates only to the message which came from the House, the office of the committee ended with the receipt of that message, and there was nothing further to be done. But of course this resolution is to be considered in the same way that the former resolution was considered. That was the construction put upon it by the Senate; that was the action taken under it by the Senate; and the Senate was in that way served.

If Senators have the book before them, they will find that after the adoption of the resolution on page 4, Mr. Platt, the chairman of the committee—of course this was after the message had come from the House—made this favorable report:

Whereas the House of Representatives, on the 14th day of December, 1904, by five of its Members—at the bar of the Senate impeached Charles Swayne, judge of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Florida, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and informed the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same; and likewise demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said Charles Swayne to answer the said impeachment: Therefore—

This was an order presented by the committee. It simply illustrates the work of the committee:

Ordered, That the Senate will, according to its standing rule and orders in such cases provided, take proper order thereon (upon the presentation of the articles of impeachment), of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives therewith.

That is one of the orders taken on the suggestion of this committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND rose.

Mr. BACON. I yielded to the Senator before and lost the floor by it. I hope the Senator will let me go on now.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wanted to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BACON. I will answer it when I get through, if the Senator will permit me to continue.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The question will lose its point by that time.

Mr. BACON. I think not.

Subsequently Senator Platt submitted another order, which had been considered and agreed upon by the committee, and will be found on the same page:

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to receive the managers,

And so forth.

That order is similar to the one we adopted on Saturday.

Then, on page 6, another order was entered by Mr. Platt. It was the work of the committee, and he was speaking for the committee:

Resolved, That the expenses incident to the impeachment trial of Charles Swayne, judge for the northern district of Florida, be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the Sergeant at Arms.

I am going to read some of these to show Senators the nature of the work the committee did, and which, I presume, either this committee or some other committee is to do unless it is going to leave it for Senators indiscriminately, one to offer one and another to offer another, without any concerted action, thereby leading to a great deal of unnecessary confusion and delay in the proceeding.

On page 10 will be found another order presented by Mr. Platt and adopted by the Senate:

Ordered, That the articles of impeachment presented this day by the House of Representatives be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senator from Utah has already offered a similar order. It is all right. There is no trouble about that.

On page 11 appears the following:

Ordered, That at 2 o'clock this afternoon the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment of Charles Swayne, judge of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Florida, presented this day.

Then, on the same page, appears the resolution adopted upon the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Spooner, which made Mr. Platt the presiding officer. Thereafter, it will be found, practically all the orders were presented by Mr. Fairbanks, who was a member of the committee and was selected by the committee as its mouthpiece to present the various orders. I will read some of them to show the things which constantly occur in the progress of the trial which make it necessary that there shall be some person or some committee charged with the preparation of the orders which are necessary and proper for the orderly procedure of the Senate in an impeachment trial.

On page 14 there is an order presented by Mr. Fairbanks. These are very simple orders, but it is necessary that they should be carefully prepared and presented and that one Senator should not get up and offer an order, and another Senator get up and offer another one, and a third another, and in that way have confusion. It is as necessary to have a committee to give proper attention and care to the preparation of these orders as it is to have committees for any other purpose in order to put matters in shape for the action of the Senate. The committee does not act for the Senate. It has no authority. It can only present matters for the action of the Senate.

On page 14 there is an order which was prepared by the committee and presented by Mr. Fairbanks, a member of the committee:

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate is now organized for the trial of articles of impeachment against Charles Swayne, judge of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Florida, and is ready to receive the managers on the part of the House at its bar.

That is a very simple order; but it is necessary that it should be prepared by somebody and that it should be prepared in such a way as to obviate the confusion which would arise from having half a dozen Senators presenting different orders at the same time, all having the same purpose in view.

Then, on page 15, there is another order prepared by the committee and presented by Mr. Fairbanks:

Ordered, That a summons be issued, as required by the Rules of Procedure and Practice in the Senate when sitting for the trial of impeachment of Charles Swayne, returnable on Friday, the 27th day of the present month, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon.

On the same page there is another order presented by Mr. Fairbanks:

Ordered, That the Senate, sitting for the trial of impeachment of Charles Swayne, adjourn until Friday, the 27th instant, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon.

And so, clear through that trial, there were orders which the Senate had to act upon, and the care and responsibility for the preparation which had to be intrusted to some person or some committee.

So the Senator from Utah is entirely mistaken when he says that so far as concerns the interpretation given to a similar resolution on a former occasion the duties of the committee are ended when the articles of impeachment are presented. The duties of the committee were continued throughout in the Swayne case. While in that case it is true that the chairman of the committee, Mr. Platt, was taken from the floor and put in the chair, he continued as the chairman of the committee, though he did not thereafter present any orders in person. But he had regular meetings of the committee every day. As matters developed and some action was necessary the committee was gathered together; and when it had framed an order some Senator—Mr. Fairbanks, usually—was given the order, and it was presented and explained to the Senate.

I think in most instances, if not in all, the Senate agreed to the orders. But there was no obligation on the Senate to agree to the orders unless it approved them. They were very largely matters of formality. But it is necessary, in the interest of orderly procedure, that these formalities should be properly cared for and prepared.

I do not know whether the Senator from Utah now desires to ask me a question or not. If he does, I shall be glad to respond to him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The question I had in mind to ask the Senator a moment ago, when he was reading the report of the committee——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. STONE. I wish to ask the Chair what is the pending question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is the motion made by the Senator from Wyoming to reconsider the vote whereby the appointment of a committee was ordered by the Senate.

Mr. STONE. That motion was made at a time when the Senator from Wyoming did not have the floor to make it.

Mr. BACON. I will yield to the Senator to let him make it as soon as I get through.

Mr. STONE. It seems to me we are wasting a great deal of time in useless discussion. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will rule that the proceeding is under the regular order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The question I was about to ask the Senator from Georgia related to the report which was made by the committee in the Swayne case. That report concludes with a proposed order—

That the Senate will, according to its standing rule and orders in such cases provided, take proper order thereon (upon the presentation of the articles of impeachment), of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

The question I wish to submit to the Senator is this: Has not the Senate already reached in this case the point that was reached in the Swayne case by the report of the committee? We have passed beyond the point of the necessity of appointing a committee, such as was provided for in the Swayne case. Is not that true?

Mr. BACON. If that is the Senator's question, I will reply to it. It was put in that way—in the shape of a report—although it embraced an order.

If that had been the final work of the committee, the suggestion of the Senator undoubtedly would be very pertinent and conclusive. But the fact is, as I have stated, that the committee did not end its work there. but continued to act during the entire trial.

I am perfectly willing to have this resolution reconsidered—in fact, I rather prefer it—and I hope some other gentleman will be appointed on the committee. But somebody will have to be on a committee.

Mr. LODGE. They did not again act as a committee in the Swayne case.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator yield to me a little further?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact that there is nothing in the record which he has read which indicates in any way that the committee acted upon anything.

Mr. BACON. I will state as a fact that it did.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let the Senator, if he will, wait until I am through. A committee would act by making a report to the Senate. There is nothing in the record to show that the committee made any report or did anything. It is true that Mr. Fairbanks, who happened to be also a member of the committee, made certain motions; but any Member of the Senate could have done that. Does the Senator from Georgia think that because we appoint a committee that precludes other Members of the Senate from making these motions and proposing these orders?

Mr. BACON. Not by any means.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The functions of the committee, as clearly indicated by the report in the Swayne case, ended when they presented the report which the Senator has read, on page 4. There is nothing to indicate that the committee had any power to do anything after that time.

Now we have reached that point. These articles of impeachment are before the Senate. The only thing which is proposed by the resolution offered by the Senator from Wyoming is to refer this message, which the Senate has already disposed of, to the committee.

It has absolutely no further duty to perform.

Mr. BAILEY rose.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I will yield to the Senator in a moment.

The Senator from Utah says there is nothing in the record to indicate that the committee continued to act. I say there is this in the record to show that the committee continued to act—the fact that every order, I think, without exception, which was thereafter presented during that trial, was presented by a member of the committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. By common consent.

Mr. BACON. Why, of course. It was the recognized function of the committee in that trial, and it did act in that way. I state as a fact—and the Senator from Wyoming, who was a member of the committee, will recall it as a fact—that the committee continued throughout that trial in the consideration of such orders as were required for the orderly conduct of the trial. When they conferred and agreed upon an order, it was thereafter presented, I think in almost every instance, after Mr. Platt took the chair, by Mr. Fairbanks; and I state as a fact—the Senator says there is nothing in the record to show it—that under that resolution the committee did act under the chairmanship of Mr. O. H. Platt during that entire time; and if I recollect aright, every order which was presented in that proceeding was an order which was considered by the committee and presented by a member of the committee.

Now, I want to repeat, if I am not fatiguing my friend, the Senator from Texas, by keeping him waiting for me to conclude——

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all.

Mr. BACON. I wish to repeat that, so far as the duties of that committee are concerned, I have no desire to be on it. I am one of the busy Members of the Senate, having more work than I can conveniently do, and I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Utah shall be made a committee sole. I am satisfied he would do it all right by himself; but it is necessary that somebody should do it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BACON. I do. I yield the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion which comes to me in considering what the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] said when he expressed the opinion that the rules themselves take care of this matter. Let us see if the rules do. For instance, Rule VIII requires:

VIII. Upon the presentation of articles of impeachment and the organization of the Senate as hereinbefore provided a writ of summons shall issue to the accused, reciting said articles and notifying him to appear before the Senate upon a day and at a place to be fixed by the Senate—

And so forth.

Now, nobody believes that the Presiding Officer is authorized to fix that day or to fix that place under the rule. Therefore it would be necessary that the Senate itself fix the time and place when and where the accused should appear to answer.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. The rule itself provides that the Senate must fix a day.

Mr. BACON. The Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand; and I was just saying that the Presiding Officer could not fix that day.

Mr. LODGE. The rule requires the Senate to do it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The rule provides that the writ shall notify him to appear at a time and place to be fixed by the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. That is what I said. The Senator merely emphasizes what I was saying.

Plainly the rule does not take care of it as the Senator from New York supposed it did, but when that committee would come back into the Senate it would consider the date upon which the accused should appear and make his answer. The committee would report a resolution fixing the day and, of course, fixing the Senate Chamber as the place. The Senate must adopt that resolution, but it ought to be first considered by a committee. What Senator would think to go around among the Senators and consult with them as to the most convenient day?

Again, Mr. President, the very statement which the Chair has made to the managers on the part of the House requires further action. The Chair's statement was that the Senate would take order and notify the House. Now, that notification to the House must be given. It is not sufficient to say that our rules say that we must be ready at 1 o'clock to-morrow, because the House is not charged with judicial notice of our rule. The managers of the House would not come here at 1 o'clock or at any other hour until, in response to the statement made by the Presiding Officer, they should be notified of the hour and the day on which the Senate would be ready to receive them.

Therefore it becomes not only appropriate but necessary that some committee should consider that question, both with reference to its convenience and with reference to the time it will take to bring the accused to the bar of the Senate in order that the Senate may act advisedly when it acts at all.

I first rose to protest against the undoing of a thing that I did not think very important, but the recitation by the Senator from Georgia of what was necessary has impressed me, and the more I think of it the more I am convinced that the committee not only would not be harmful, but that it would be immensely useful to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I note the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived. I was going to ask——

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest that the bill be laid aside temporarily.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] gave notice at the last session of the Senate that he would call up the seal bill to-day, which is a very important measure. He was prevented from doing so by the matter which has been before the Senate. If the Senator will indulge me for a minute, I ask unanimous consent that the article which I send to the Clerk's desk, entitled "Relation of the Panama Canal to the Traffic and Rates of American Railroads," by Prof. Emory R. Johnson, the special commissioner appointed by the President to investigate that matter, may be printed as a Senate document (S. Doc. No. 875) and that 500 extra copies may be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now, I ask unanimous consent that House bill 21969, which is the unfinished business, as reported, with the amendments recommended by the Senate committee, may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill as reported is as follows:

[In the Senate of the United States, Calendar No. 771, Sixty-second Congress, second session, H. R. 21969.]

May 24, 1912, read twice and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

June 12, 1912, reported by Mr. BRANDEGEE, with amendments.

An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the zone of land and land under water of the width of ten miles extending to the distance of five miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal now being constructed thereon, which zone begins in the Caribbean Sea three marine miles from mean low-water mark and extends to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to the distance of three marine miles from mean low-water mark, [excepting and] excluding therefrom the cities of Panama and Colon and their adjacent harbors located within said zone, as excepted in the treaty with the Republic of Panama dated November eighteenth, nineteen hundred and three, but including all islands within said described zone, and in addition thereto the group of islands in the Bay of Panama named Perico, Naos, Culebra, and [Falmenco] Flamenco, and any lands and waters outside of said limits above described which are necessary or convenient or from time to time may become necessary or convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, or protection of the said canal or of any auxiliary canals, lakes, or other works necessary or convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, or protection of said canal, the use, occupancy, or control whereof were granted to the United States by the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama, the ratifications of which were exchanged on the twenty-sixth day of February, nineteen hundred and four, shall be known and designated as the Canal Zone, and the canal now being costructed thereon shall hereafter be known and designated as the Panama Canal. The President is authorized, [to acquire] by treaty with the Republic of Panama, to acquire any additional land or land under water not already granted, or which was excepted from the grant, that he may deem necessary for the operation, maintenance, sanitation, or protection of the Panama Canal, and [may, in like manner,] to exchange any land or land under water not deemed necessary for such purposes for other land or land under water which may be deemed necessary for such purposes, which additional land or land under water so acquired shall become part of the Canal Zone.

SEC. 2. That all laws, orders, regulations, and ordinances adopted and promulgated in the Canal Zone by order of the President for the government and sanitation of the Canal Zone and the construction of the Panama Canal are hereby ratified and confirmed as valid and binding until Congress shall otherwise provide. The existing courts established in the Canal Zone by Executive order are recognized and confirmed to continue in operation until [Congress shall otherwise provide] the courts provided for in this act shall be established.

SEC. 3. That the President is authorized to declare by Executive order that all land and land under water within the limits of the Canal Zone is necessary for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, or protection of the Panama Canal, and to extinguish, by agreement when advisable, all claims and titles of adverse claimants and occupants. Upon failure to secure by agreement title to any such parcel of land or land under water the adverse claim or occupancy shall be disposed of and title thereto secured in the United States and compensation therefor fixed and paid in the manner provided in the aforesaid treaty with the Republic of Panama, or such modification of such treaty as may hereafter be made.

SEC. 4. That when [in the judgment of the President] the construction of the Panama Canal shall be [sufficiently advanced toward completion] completed so as to render unnecessary the further services of the Isthmian Canal Commission [unnecessary] as now constituted the President is authorized [by Executive order to discontinue the Isthmian Canal Commission, which, together with the present organization, shall then cease to exist; and the President is authorized thereafter to complete and operate the Panama Canal or cause it to be completed and operated through a governor of the Panama Canal and such other persons as he may deem competent to discharge the various duties connected with the completion, care, maintenance, sanitation, operation, and protection of the Canal] to reduce the membership of the commission to three, one chosen from the Corps of Engineers of the Army, who shall be president of the commission as so reorganized, one experienced in the work of sanitation in the Tropics, and one a civilian. The president of said commission shall receive a salary of ten thousand dollars per annum, and the other members each shall receive a salary of nine thousand dollars per annum. Said commissioners shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold office until their successors shall be appointed and qualified. Until otherwise provided by law, the President, through such commission, shall provide for the government of the Canal Zone and the completion and operation of the canal. Any of the persons appointed or employed [as aforesaid] under the provisions of this act may be persons in the military, naval, or civil service of the United States, but the amount of the official salary paid to any such person shall be deducted from the amount of salary or compensation provided by or which shall be fixed under the terms of this act. [The governor of the Panama Canal shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, commissioned for a term of four years, and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified. He shall receive a salary of ten thousand dollars a year.] All other persons necessary for the completion, care, management, maintenance, sanitation, and operation of the Panama Canal shall be appointed by the [President, or by his authority] commission, removable at [his] its pleasure, and the compensation of such persons shall be fixed by the President, or by his authority, until such time as Congress may, by [appropriation act or other] law, regulate the same, but salaries or compensation fixed hereunder by the President shall in no instance exceed by more than twenty-five per centum the salary or compensation paid for the same or similar services to persons employed by the Government in continental United States. That upon the completion of the Panama Canal the President shall cause the same to be officially and formally opened for use and operation.

SEC. 5. That the President is hereby authorized to prescribe and from time to time change the tolls that shall be levied by the Government of the United States for the use of the Panama Canal: Provided, That no tolls, when prescribed as above, shall be changed, except six months' notice thereof shall have been given by the President by proclamation. No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States. Tolls may be based upon gross or net registered tonnage, displacement tonnage, or otherwise, and may be based on one form of tonnage for warships and another for ships of commerce. When based upon net registered tonnage for ships of commerce the tolls shall not exceed one dollar and twenty-five cents per net registered ton, nor be less [, other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens,] than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal, subject, however, to the provisions of article nineteen of the convention between the United States and the Republic of Panama, entered into November eighteenth, nineteen hundred and three. No tolls shall be levied upon vessels of American registry engaged in the foreign trade if the owners agree that such vessels may be taken and used by the United States in time of war or other public emergency, in the discretion of the President, upon payment to the owners of the fair actual value at the time of the taking; and if there shall be a disagreement as to the fair actual value of the same at the time of the taking between the United States and the owners then the same shall be determined by two disinterested appraisers, one to be appointed by each of the said parties, they at the same time selecting a third, who shall act in said appraisement in case the two fail to agree; and the decision of any two of the appraisers shall be final and conclusive: Provided, however, That under regulations prescribed by the President a vessel paying toll going through the canal in ballast shall, on its return trip through the canal laden with cargo, be entitled to receive a rebate of fifty per centum of the tolls just previously paid going through in the opposite direction without cargo. If the tolls shall not be based upon net registered tonnage, they shall not exceed the equivalent of one dollar and twenty-five cents per net registered ton as nearly as the same may be determined, nor be less than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal. The toll for each passenger shall not be more than one dollar and fifty cents. The President is authorized to make and from time to time amend regulations governing the operation of the Panama Canal, and the passage and control of vessels through the same or any part thereof, including the locks and approaches thereto, and all rules and regulations affecting pilots and pilotage in the canal or the approaches thereto through the adjacent waters.

Such regulations shall provide for prompt adjustment by agreement and immediate payment of claims for damages which may arise from alleged injury to vessels, cargo, or passengers from the passing of vessels through the locks under the control of those operating them under such rules and regulations. In case of disagreement suit may be brought in the district court of the Canal Zone against the [governor of the Panama Canal] Isthmian Canal Commission. The hearing and disposition of such cases shall be expedited and the judgment shall be immediately paid [off] without proceeding to execution. All such claims, whether by agreement or after judgment, shall be paid out of any moneys appropriated or allotted for canal operation.

[The President shall provide a method for the determination and adjustment of all claims arising out of personal injuries to employees thereafter occurring while directly engaged in actual work in connection with the construction, maintenance, operation, or sanitation of the canal or of the Panama Railroad, or of any auxiliary canals, locks, or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, or sanitation of the canal, whether such injuries result in death or not, and may revise and modify such method at any time; and such claims, to the extent they shall be allowed on such adjustment, if allowed at all, shall be paid out of the moneys hereafter appropriated for that purpose or out of the funds of the Panama Railroad Company, if said company was responsible for said injury, as the case may require. And after such method shall be provided by the President, the provisions of the act entitled "An act granting to certain employees of the United States the right to receive from it compensation for injuries sustained in the course of their employment," approved May thirtieth, nineteen hundred and eight, and of the act entitled "An act relating to injured employees on the Isthmian Canal," approved February twenty-fourth, nineteen hundred and nine, shall not apply to personal injuries thereafter received and claims for which are subject to determination and adjustment as provided in this section.]

The provisions of the act entitled "An act granting to certain employees of the United States the right to receive from it compensation for injuries sustained in the course of their employment," approved May thirtieth, nineteen hundred and eight, and of the act entitled "An act relating to injured employees on the Isthmian Canal," approved February twenty-fourth, nineteen hundred and nine, shall apply to the determination and adjustment of all claims arising out of personal injuries to employees occurring while directly engaged in actual work in connection with the construction, maintenance, operation, or sanitation of the canal, or of the Panama Railroad, or of any auxiliary canals, locks, or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, or sanitation of the canal, whether such injuries result in death or not; and such claims as shall be allowed under such provisions shall be paid out of moneys appropriated for that purpose, or out of the funds of the Panama Railroad Company if said company was responsible for said injury, as the case may require.

SEC. 6. That the President is authorized to cause to be erected, maintained, and operated, at suitable places along the Panama Canal and the coast adjacent to its two terminals, in connection with the operation of said canal, such wireless telegraphic installations as he may deem necessary for the operation, maintenance, sanitation, and protection of said canal. If it is found necessary to locate such installations upon territory of the Republic of Panama, the President is authorized to make such agreement with said Government as may be necessary, and also to provide for the acceptance and transmission, by said system, of all private and commercial messages, and those of the Government of Panama, on such terms and for such tolls as the President may prescribe: Provided, That the messages of the Government of the United States and the departments thereof, and the management of the Panama Canal, shall always be given precedence over all other messages. The President is also authorized, in his discretion, to enter into such operating agreements or leases with any private wireless company or companies as may best insure freedom from interference with the wireless telegraphic installations established by the United States. The President is also authorized to establish, maintain, and operate, through the Panama Railroad Company or otherwise, dry docks, repair shops, yards, docks, wharves, warehouses, storehouses, and other necessary facilities and appurtenances for the purpose of providing coal and other materials, labor, repairs, and supplies for [our official] vessels [,] of the Government of the United States and, incidentally, for supplying such at reasonable prices to passing vessels, in accordance with appropriations hereby authorized to be made from time to time by Congress as a part of the maintenance and operation of the said canal. Moneys received [in the ordinary course of business] from the conduct of said business may be expended and reinvested for such purposes without being covered into the Treasury of the United States; and such moneys are hereby appropriated for such purposes, but all deposits of such funds shall be subject to the provisions of existing law relating to the deposit of other public funds of the United States, and any net profits accruing from such business shall annually be covered into the Treasury of the United States. Monthly reports of such receipts and expenditures shall be made to the President by the persons in charge, and annual reports shall be made to the Congress.

SEC. 7. That the [governor of the Panama Canal] Isthmian Canal Commission shall, in connection with the operation of such canal, have official control and jurisdiction over the Canal Zone and shall perform all duties in connection with the civil government of the Canal Zone, which is to be held, treated, and governed as an adjunct of such Panama Canal. [Unless in this act otherwise provided all existing laws of the Canal Zone referring to the civil governor or the civil administration of the Canal Zone shall be applicable to the governor of the Panama Canal, who shall perform all such executive and administrative duties required by existing law.] The [President] Isthmian Canal Commission is authorized to determine or cause to be determined what towns shall exist in the Canal Zone and subdivide and from time to time resubdivide said Canal Zone into subdivisions, to be designated by name or number, so that there shall be situated one town in each subdivision, and the boundaries of each subdivision shall be clearly defined. In each town there shall be a magistrate's court with exclusive original jurisdiction coextensive with the subdivision in which it is situated of all civil cases [of every character] in which the principal sum claimed does not exceed three hundred dollars, and all criminal cases wherein the [fine] punishment that [can] may be imposed [could] shall not exceed [twenty-five] a fine of one hundred dollars, or imprisonment [could] not [exceed] exceeding thirty days, or both, and all violations of police regulations and ordinances and all actions involving possession or title to personal property or the forcible entry and detainer of real estate [, and all other matters and proceedings which are now within the jurisdiction of the present district judge or the courts]. Such magistrates shall also hold preliminary investigations in charges of felony and offenses under section ten of this act, and commit or bail in bailable cases to the district court. A sufficient number of magistrates and constables, who must be citizens of the United States, to conduct the business of such courts, shall be appointed by the [governor of the Panama Canal] Isthmian Canal Commission for terms of four years and until their successors are appointed and qualified, and the compensation of such persons shall be fixed by the President, or by his authority, until such time as Congress may by [appropriation act or other] law prescribe the same. The rules governing said courts and prescribing the duties of said magistrates and constables, oaths and bonds, the times and places of holding such courts, the disposition of fines, costs, forfeitures, enforcements of judgments, providing for the allowance and prosecution of appeals therefrom to the district court, and the disposition, treatment, and pardon of [misdemeanor] convicts shall be established by order of the President. The [governor of the Panama Canal] Isthmian Canal Commission shall appoint all notaries public, prescribe their powers and duties, their official seal, and the fees to be charged and collected by them.

SEC. 8. That there shall be in the Canal Zone one district court with two divisions, one including Balboa and the other including Cristobal; and one district judge of the said district, who shall hold his court in both divisions at such time as he may designate by order, at least once a month in each division. The rules of practice in such district court shall be prescribed or amended by order of the President. The said district court shall have original jurisdiction of all felony cases, of offenses arising under section ten of this act, and [of] all causes in equity and admiralty and all cases at law involving principal sums exceeding three hundred dollars and [of] all appeals from judgments rendered in magistrates' courts. The jurisdiction in admiralty herein conferred upon the district judge and the district court shall be the same that is exercised by the United States district judges and the United States district courts, and the procedure and practice shall also be the same. The district judge shall also have jurisdiction of all other matters and proceedings not herein provided for which are now within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the Canal Zone, of the Circuit Court of the Canal Zone, or the District Court of the Canal Zone, or the judges thereof. Said judge shall provide for the selection, summoning, serving, and compensation of jurors from among the citizens of the United States, to be subject to jury duty in either division of such district, and a jury shall be had in any criminal case or civil case at law originating in said court on the demand of either party. There shall be a district attorney and a marshal for said court. It shall be the duty of the district attorney to conduct all business, civil and criminal, for the Government, and to advise the [governor of the Panama Canal] Isthmian Canal Commission on all legal questions touching the operation of the canal and the administration of civil affairs. It shall be the duty of the marshal to execute all process of the court, preserve order therein, and do all things incident to the office of marshal. The district judge, the district attorney, and the marshal shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for terms of four years each, [or] and until their successors are appointed and qualified, and during their terms of office shall reside within the Canal Zone, and shall hold no other office nor serve on any official board or commission nor receive any emoluments except their salaries. The district judge shall receive the same salary paid the district judges of the United States, and shall appoint the clerk of said court, who shall receive a salary to be fixed by the President. The district judge shall be entitled to six weeks' leave of absence each year with pay. During his absence or during any period of disability or disqualification from sickness or otherwise to discharge his duties the same shall be temporarily performed by any circuit or district judge of the United States who may be designated by the President, and who, during such service, shall receive the additional mileage and per diem allowed by law to district judges of the United States when holding court away from their homes. The district attorney and the marshal shall be paid each a salary of five thousand dollars per annum.

SEC. 9. That the records of the existing courts and all causes, proceedings, and criminal prosecutions pending therein as shown by the dockets thereof, except as herein otherwise provided, shall immediately upon the organization of the courts created by this act be transferred to such new courts having jurisdiction of like cases, be entered upon the dockets thereof, and proceed as if they had originally been brought therein, whereupon all the existing courts, except the supreme court of the Canal Zone, shall cease to exist. The President may continue the supreme court of the Canal Zone and retain the judges thereof in office for such time as to him may seem necessary to determine finally any causes and proceedings which may be pending therein. All laws of the Canal Zone imposing duties upon the clerks or ministerial officers of existing courts shall apply and impose such duties upon the clerks and ministerial officers of the new courts created by this act having jurisdiction of like cases, matters, and duties.

All existing laws in the Canal Zone governing practice and procedure in existing courts shall be applicable and adapted to the practice and procedure in the new courts.

The Circuit Court of Appeals of the Fifth Circuit of the United States shall have jurisdiction to review, revise, modify, reverse, or affirm the final judgments and decrees of the district court of the Canal Zone and to render such judgments as in the opinion of the said appellate court should have been rendered by the trial court in all actions and proceedings in which the Constitution, or any statute, treaty, title, right, or privilege of the United States, is involved and a right thereunder denied, and in cases in which the value in controversy exceeds one thousand dollars [or which involves the title or possession of real estate exceeding in value the sum of one thousand dollars], to be ascertained by the oath of either party, or by other competent evidence, and also in criminal causes wherein the offense charged is punishable as a felony. And such appellate jurisdiction, subject to the rights of review by or appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States as in other cases authorized by law, may be exercised by said circuit court of appeals in the same manner, under the same regulations, and by the same procedure as nearly as practicable as is done in reviewing the final judgments and decrees of the district courts of the United States.

SEC. 10. That after the Panama Canal shall have been completed and opened for operation the [governor of the Canal Zone] Isthmian Canal Commission shall have the right to make such rules and regulations, subject to the approval of the President, touching the right of any person to remain upon or pass over any part of the Canal Zone as may be necessary. Any person violating any of such rules or regulations shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction in the [magistrate's court] District Court of the [subdivision in which the violation occurred] Canal Zone shall be punished by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars or by imprisonment not exceeding a year, or both, in the discretion of the court. It shall be unlawful for any person, by any means or in any way, to injure or obstruct, or attempt to injure or obstruct, any part of the Panama Canal or the locks thereof or the approaches thereto. Any person violating this provision shall be guilty of a felony, and on conviction in the District Court of the Canal Zone shall be punished by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars or by imprisonment not exceeding [ten] twenty years, or both, in the discretion of the court. If the act shall cause the death of any person within a year and a day thereafter, the person so convicted shall be guilty of murder and shall be punished accordingly.

["From and after the first day of July, nineteen hundred and fourteen, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner) in any common carrier by water with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic; and in case of the violation of this provision each day in which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense."]

[Jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine questions of fact as to the competition or possibility of competition, after full hearing, on the application of any railroad company or other carrier. Such application may be filed for the purpose of determining whether any existing service is in violation of this section and pray for an order permitting the continuance of any vessel or vessels already in operation, or for the purpose of asking an order to install new service not in conflict with the provisions of this paragraph. The commission may on its own motion or the application of any shipper institute proceedings to inquire into the operation of any vessel in use by any railroad or other carrier which has not applied to the commission and had the question of competition or the possibility of competition determined as herein provided. In all such cases the order of said commission shall be final.]

SEC. 11. That no ship owned, chartered, operated, or controlled by a railroad company, or in which any railroad company has any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly or indirectly, through any holding company, or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner), shall be permitted to enter or pass through the Panama Canal if engaged in the coastwise trade between ports of the United States. That any ship of American registry, however owned or controlled, shall be permitted to operate through the canal in transoceanic trade to and from oriental or European countries; said vessel on its way to and from said foreign countries shall be permitted to do a coastwise trade between ports of the United States and intermediate foreign ports: Provided, That this shall not be permitted to any ship owned or controlled in whole or in part by any railroad company, except those engaged in said transoceanic trade, nor shall any coastwise trade be done by any such ship unless on a voyage to or from such transoceanic ports, and not to those of Canada, Mexico, or any Central or South American port: Provided further, That no such railroad owned or controlled ship shall pass through the canal unless at least fifty per centum of its cargo, in tonnage, is destined to or shipped from oriental or European ports.

That section six of [said] the act to regulate commerce, approved February fourth, eighteen hundred and eighty-seven, as heretofore amended, is hereby amended by adding a new paragraph at the end thereof, as follows:

"When property may be or is transported from point to point in the United States by rail and water through the Panama Canal or otherwise, the transportation being by a common carrier or carriers, and not entirely within the limits of a single State, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have jurisdiction of such transportation and of the carriers, both by rail and by water, which may or do engage in the same, in the following particulars, in addition to the jurisdiction given by the act to regulate commerce, as amended June eighteenth, nineteen hundred and ten:

"(a) To establish physical connection between the lines of the rail carrier and the dock of the water carrier by directing the rail carrier to make suitable connection between its line and a track or tracks which have been constructed from the dock to the limits of its right of way, or by directing either or both the rail and water carrier, individually or in connection with one another, to construct and connect with the lines of the rail carrier a spur track or tracks to the dock. This provision shall only apply where such connection is reasonably practicable, can be made with safety to the public, where the public, in the judgment of the commission, will be benefited by such connection, and where the amount of business to be handled is sufficient to justify the outlay.

"The commission shall have full authority to determine the terms and conditions upon which these connecting tracks, when constructed, shall be operated, and it may, either in the construction or the operation of such tracks, determine what sum shall be paid to or by either carrier. The provisions of this paragraph shall extend to cases where the dock is owned by other parties than the carrier involved.

"(b) To establish through routes and maximum joint rates between and over such rail and water lines, and to determine all the terms and conditions under which such lines shall be operated in the handling of the traffic embraced.

"(c) To establish maximum proportional rates by rail to and from the ports to which the traffic is brought or from which it is taken by the water carrier and to determine to what traffic and in connection with what vessels and upon what terms and conditions such rates shall apply. By proportional rates are meant those which differ from the corresponding local rates to and from the port and which apply only to traffic which has been brought to the port or is carried from the port by a common carrier by water.

"(d) If any rail carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce enters into arrangements with any water carrier operating from a port in the United States to a foreign country, through the Panama Canal or otherwise, for the handling of through business between interior points of the United States and such foreign country, the Interstate Commerce Commission may require such railway to enter into similar arrangements with any or all other lines of steamships operating from said port to the same foreign country."

The orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission relating to this section shall only be made upon formal complaint or in proceedings instituted by the commission of its own motion and after full hearing. The orders provided for in the two amendments to the act to regulate commerce enacted in this section shall be served in the same manner and enforced by the same penaltes and proceedings as are the orders of the commission made under the provisions of section fifteen of the act to regulate commerce, as amended June eighteenth, nineteen hundred and ten, and they may be conditioned for the payment of any sum or the giving of security for the payment of any sum or the discharge of any obligation which may be required by the terms of said order.

SEC. 12. That all laws and treaties relating to the extradition of persons accused of crime in force in the United States, to the extent that they may not be in conflict with or superseded by any special treaty entered into between the United States and the Republic of Panama with respect to the Canal Zone, and all laws relating to the rendition of fugitives from justice as between the several States and Territories of the United States, shall extend to and be considered in force in the Canal Zone, and for such purposes and such purposes only the Canal Zone shall be considered and treated as an organized Territory of the United States.

SEC. 13. That in time of war in which the United States shall be engaged, or when, in the opinion of the President, war is imminent, such officer of the Army as the President may designate shall, upon the order of the President, assume and have exclusive authority and jurisdiction over the operation of the Panama Canal and all of its adjuncts, appendants, and appurtenances, including the entire control and government of the Canal Zone, and during a continuance of such condition the [governor of the Panama Canal] Isthmian Canal Commission shall, in all respects and particulars as to the operation of such Panama Canal, and all duties, matters, and transactions affecting the Canal Zone, be subject to the order and direction of such officer of the Army.

SEC. 14. That this act shall be known as, and referred to as, the Panama Canal Act, and the right to alter, amend, or repeal any or all of its provisions or to extend, modify, or annul any rule or regulation made under its authority is expressly reserved.

Passed the House of Representatives May 23, 1912.

Attest:

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator from Connecticut mean to request that it be laid aside for the day?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask that it be just temporarily laid aside, to retain its place on the calendar as the unfinished business.

Mr. STONE. Is it the expectation of the Senator to call it up again during this day?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I shall be very glad to call it up again during the day, if the opportunity presents itself, and to have the bill read. All I have asked is that it be temporarily laid aside, which is the usual request in such cases.

Mr. STONE. I know it is the usual request, but I am asking the Senator to make a statement as to his purpose, whether he intends by that request to lay the unfinished business aside for the day.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not if I can get it up again; but I will state that there are several appropriation bills to come in, and of course if they do they will have the right of way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the motion of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will say to the Senator that I intend not only to call it up again to-day at the earliest possible moment, but on every other day I intend to call it up when I can get it up under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. I will object to laying it aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri objects.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am perfectly willing to go ahead with the bill, and only asked to have it laid aside informally that a measure which is of great importance might be considered.

CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT OF SENATE.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I submit what I consider a privileged resolution. I ask that it be read and lie on the table, and if I find an opportunity I will submit some observations on it to the Senate to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 357) was read as follows:

Whereas the Constitution of the United States makes the Senate the sole judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members; and

Whereas every Senator is required by his oath of office to decide all such cases according to the law and the testimony before him: Therefore be it

Resolved, That any attempt on the part of the President of the United States to exercise the powers and influence of his great office for the purpose of controlling the vote of any Senator upon a question involving the right to a seat in the Senate violates the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution, invades the rights of the Senate, and ought to be severely condemned.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask that the resolution may lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. CUMMINS and others addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do. I will say that I will yield to any Senator for morning business.

(Certain routine business was transacted, which appears under its proper headings.)

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Prior to the last legislative day a motion was entered by me for the recall of a bill from the House of Representatives, and I also gave notice of an intention to move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate refused to agree to the amendments of the House and requested a conference. I ask the Chair to lay the matter before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message of the House will be laid before the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

In the House of Representatives, July 8, 1912:
Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to return to the Senate, in compliance with its request, Senate bill 6084, granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House and requested a conference.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut suggests the absence of a quorum. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Culberson	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Bacon	Cullom	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.
Bourne	Dillingham	Massey	Smith, Mich.
Bradley	Dixon	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Fall	Nelson	Smoot
Bristow	Fletcher	Newlands	Stephenson
Bryan	Gallinger	Oliver	Stone
Burnham	Gamble	Overman	Sutherland
Burton	Gronna	Page	Swanson
Catron	Hitchcock	Percy	Thornton
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Perkins	Tillman
Clapp	Johnston, Ala.	Pomerene	Townsend
Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Reed	Warren
Clarke, Ark.	Kenyon	Sanders	Wetmore
Crane	Lippitt	Shively	Williams
Crawford	Lodge	Simmons	Works

Mr. THORNTON. I announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER] on account of sickness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. JONES. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is detained from the Senate by important business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives and calls the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to it.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution of the House (No. 59), as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the action of the Vice President and President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives in signing the enrolled bill (H. R. 23515) entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors," be rescinded; that the Clerk be directed to reenroll said bill; and that, in the reenrollment of said bill, the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to amend the title of said bill by striking out the word "of" where it first appears in the fourth line thereof and insert in lieu thereof the word "and."

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the Senate agree to the resolution.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I demand the regular order.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not yet yielded the floor. We had another matter before the Senate when the call for a quorum was made.

Mr. STONE. The regular order is demanded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the regular order. It is a message from the House which, under the rules, the Chair is compelled to lay before the Senate at any time.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which it disagreed to the amendments of the House to Senate bill 6084 and requested a conference with the House and the conferees were appointed.

Mr. STONE. I object, and demand the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the regular order.

Mr. STONE. I beg the Chair's pardon; I make the point of order that laying the message of the House before the Senate is one thing and proceeding to legislate upon that message is another thing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that any motion relating to the message from the House must be in order, either to recede or concur.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be disposed of in a moment. The Senator from North Dakota moves that the action of the Senate disagreeing to the amendments of the House and sending the bill and amendments to conference be reconsidered.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I insist that the ruling of the Chair is not correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be very glad to hear any Senator on that matter.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I simply want to suggest that the point made by the Senator from Missouri must necessarily be a good one. The question suggested by the motion made by the Senator from North Dakota is a debatable question, and if the ruling of the Chair is correct any proceeding could be interrupted under the privileged feature, or rather the obligatory feature, which requires the Chair to lay a message from the House of Representatives before the Senate. If that followed then any proceeding could thereafter be interrupted and a debate of interminable length injected into it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For the instruction of the Chair will the Senator suggest when this matter can properly come before the Senate again?

Mr. BACON. I presume it can come at any time when it would be in order to take up any business.

Mr. STONE. At any time?

Mr. BACON. At any time when a motion is in order to take up something else. It is in order now for the Senator from North Dakota to move to take it up, but if he does and the motion prevails it displaces the regular order and becomes then the unfinished business. There is no question about that whatever. It is always in order to be moved, and it is always within the power of the Senate to say no; but it is not a privileged matter as is the laying of a message from the House before the Senate. It is privileged that the Senate shall be informed promptly of any communication which comes from the House, but the action the Senate will take upon it when it will proceed to discuss that communication is another matter. It rests exactly as any other matter. It rests in the power of the Senate to consider it as it sees proper upon a motion so made.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me explain it to the Senator from Georgia and then I do not think he will make any further objection to this proceeding.

Mr. BACON. I am not objecting.

Mr. McCUMBER. The matter is one in which the House amended a Senate bill for pensions by striking out two names. Not having the information before me at the time, I moved to disagree to the House amendment and to have a committee of conference appointed. I ascertained afterwards that the two names stricken out were stricken out because of the death of two parties, and therefore there is nothing really to go to conference upon. Then I gave notice of a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were disagreed to, and also moved to request the House to return the bill to the Senate. The only object of this motion is to reconsider the vote and to agree to the amendments of the House.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. In just a moment. When the matter comes over from the House it comes here as a message from the House as a message comes from the President, or a message from any proper source, and the message then as it comes is subject to the action of the Senate immediately when it is laid before the Senate. It may lie on the table or the Senate may at that time refer it to a proper committee or do what is the proper thing with reference to the message.

We have taken much more time in the discussion of it than it would have taken to dispose of it. It seems to me that we are hardly justified in further delaying the matter.

Mr. BACON. I wish to say to the Senator that I have not objected to it and I do not object to it. The Senator from Missouri objected to it. The only object I had was to maintain what I consider to be the correct parliamentary procedure. I was unwilling that a precedent should be established under which, when a message comes from the House, its consideration could then be proceeded with as a matter of privilege. I do not think that is the rule. Yet that would be the rule if the fact that a message was laid before the Senate, which of course it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate, carries with it the privilege of immediate consideration. That is a very serious matter, and one that I do not think the rules will support in any way. It was solely in the interest of what I consider to be correct parliamentary procedure that I had anything to say and not because I have any objection to its consideration. I have none.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am ready for the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that it has been the universal practice of the Senate to act upon a message of this kind, and yet if there is objection the Chair will permit the matter to go over until another time. Does the Senator from Missouri enter the objection?

Mr. STONE. I made the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the matter will go over for the present. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask that the bill may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, ordinarily I should now ask that the bill be read for committee amendments, but I have been informed that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] desires to submit some remarks upon certain features of the bill and would prefer to do so at this point before the bill is taken up for committee amendments. I will ask the Senator if I understand his position correctly?

Mr. BURTON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then, Mr. President, I will defer any remarks I may have to make until later.

Mr. BURTON obtained the floor.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Crawford	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I suppose there will be no vote this afternoon upon any of the amendments proposed by the committee, and I take this occasion to call to the attention of the Senate two provisions, one in the bill as it came from the House, and another, even more objectionable as it seems to me, among the amendments proposed by the Senate committee.

The first paragraph to which I wish to direct attention is contained in the bill as it passed the House, and is found on page 6, lines 13 and 14 of section 5:

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

The second paragraph is the proposed amendment suggested by the Senate committee, beginning at the bottom of page 6:

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels of American registry engaged in the foreign trade if the owners agree that such vessels may be taken and used by the United States in time of war or other public emergency, in the discretion of the President, upon payment to the owners of the fair actual value at the time of the taking; and if there shall be a disagreement as to the fair actual value of the same at the time of the taking between the United States and the owners then the same shall be determined by two disinterested appraisers, one to be appointed by each of the said parties, they at the same time selecting a third, who shall act in said appraisement in case the two fail to agree; and the decision of any two of the appraisers shall be final and conclusive.

In brief, the first paragraph contained in the House bill exempts from tolls vessels that are engaged in the coastwise trade. The second paragraph, the suggested Senate amendment, exempts, on certain conditions, vessels of American register engaged in the foreign trade.

There are several reasons why these paragraphs should not be adopted, but to-day I wish to give my attention to the objection from an international standpoint.

It is a time for us to show a scrupulous regard for the observance of treaty relations. This country has become too large, its trade relations too wide, and its future growth and prosperity depend too much upon friendly relations with other countries to allow us to pursue any selfish or narrow policy. In recent years the growth of our commerce, particularly of our exports, has been a marvel to the commercial world. Our future largely depends upon the continuing increase of this commerce. Nothing will insure its increase more certainly than the respect and friendliness of other nations.

If there is one policy toward which the uniform course of the United States may be said to point, it is that of neutralization and equal terms for the use of all waterways, natural or artificial.

This traditional policy was prompted in earlier days by the large extent of our shipping. Even before the Revolutionary War the Colonies shipped very considerable quantities of exports to the Mediterranean and also to the north of Europe. Since that date we have advocated the same principles because of the importance of our export trade. The absence of outlying possessions exercised a similar influence. This traditional policy has been fostered, more than for all other reasons, because of a liberal and progressive spirit actuated by a desire for amicable relations with all nations.

Our country was one of the most active in protesting against the sound dues imposed by the Government of Denmark, although ships had to pass from the North Sea to the Baltic Sea within cannon shot of shore, and these channels were furnished by the Danish Government with aids to navigation, such as suitable lights and buoys. In the year 1857 for a financial consideration we purchased exemption from those dues.

We insisted upon the continued neutralization of the Strait of Magellan. Mr. Evarts, our Secretary of State, in a letter dated January 18, 1879, said on this subject:

The Government of the United States will not tolerate exclusive claims by any nation whatsoever to the Strait of Magellan, and will hold responsible any Government that undertakes, no matter on what pretext, to lay any impost or check on United States commerce through this strait.

The triumphs of our Navy under Decatur, Bainbridge, and others against the Barbary pirates in the Mediterranean Sea, inured not alone to our benefit, but to the safety of the commerce of the whole civilized world.

We secured by treaty stipulations the equal use of the St. Lawrence River through Canadian territory. To-day we grant and receive equal privileges in canals near to the Canadian border.

Pursuant to this general policy, the tenor of our diplomatic negotiations and legislation has been toward a neutral canal across the Isthmus, through which the boats of all nations might pass on equal terms.

In the latter part of his life a medal was suggested for Henry Clay, and as one of the inscriptions upon it he insisted upon having engraved the words "Panama Instructions." These instructions were given to Messrs. Anderson and Sargent, in 1826. In these he wrote:

If a canal across the Isthmus be opened so as to admit of the passage of sea vessels from ocean to ocean, the benefits of it ought not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe, upon the payment of a just compensation or reasonable tolls.

This was the first declaration by a Secretary of State, other official, or Congress in regard to the proposed Panama Canal. Since that time this first declaration has been confirmed by American statesmen of all political parties—Whig, Democratic, and Republican—with substantial unanimity. The principle has been enunciated by presidential messages, by instructions from Secretaries of State, and by resolutions of the House and Senate and of Congress. The message of President Roosevelt, in submitting the treaty with Panama, expressly states this policy.

I will read a few of these.

On the 3d day of March, 1835, the United States Senate unanimously adopted a resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the Governments of other nations, and particularly with the Governments of Central America and New Granada, for the purpose of effectually protecting, by suitable treaty stipulations with them, such individuals or companies as may undertake to open a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and of securing forever, by such stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations, on the payment of such reasonable tolls as may be established to compensate the capitalists who may engage in such undertaking and complete the work.

So much for the action of the Senate.

Four years later, in 1839, the House of Representatives, by unanimous vote, adopted a resolution much the same as that of the Senate, requesting the President—to consider the expediency of opening or continuing negotiations with the Governments of other nations, and particularly with those of the territorial jurisdiction of which comprehends the Isthmus of Panama, and to which the United States have accredited ministers or agents, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of effecting a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus, and of securing forever, by suitable treaty stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal by all nations.

On the conclusion of the treaty with New Granada in 1846 President Polk submitted the treaty to the Senate with a message, in which he said:

In entering into the mutual guaranties proposed by the thirty-fifth article of the treaty neither the Government of New Granada nor that of the United States has a narrow or exclusive view. The ultimate object, as presented by the Senate of the United States in their resolution (March 3, 1835) to which I have already referred, is to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the Isthmus. * * * The interests of the world at stake are so important that the security of this passage between the two oceans can not be suffered to depend upon the wars and revolutions which may arise among different nations.

President Taylor in his message to Congress December 4, 1849, said:

* * * All States entering into such a treaty will enjoy the right of passage through the canal on payment of the same tolls. The work, if constructed under these guaranties, will become a bond of peace instead of a subject of contention and strife between the nations of the earth. Should the great maritime States of Europe consent to this arrangement—and we have no reason to suppose that a proposition so fair and honorable will be opposed by any—the energies of their people and ours will cooperate in promoting the success of the enterprise. * * * Should such a work be constructed under the common protection of all nations for equal benefits to all it would be neither just nor expedient that any great maritime State should command the communication. The territory through which the canal may be opened ought to be freed from the claims of any foreign power. No such power should occupy a position that would enable it hereafter to exercise so controlling an influence over the commerce of the world or to obstruct a highway which ought to be dedicated to the common uses of mankind.

It may be said that these expressions were used at a time when it was contemplated that the canal would be constructed by private capital, and that in view of the fact that the Government has undertaken this work a different status is created, but the very language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 and the later treaty with Panama negatives this contention. It was clearly the intent of both treaties to continue the policy which had been enunciated in former years.

In this connection, reading chronologically, I wish to quote certain instructions from Secretaries of State. Mr. Secretary Fish, during the administration of President Grant, wrote:

* * * A Darien canal should not be regarded as hostile to a Suez Canal. They will be not so much rivals as joint contributors to the increase of the commerce of the world, and thus mutually advance each other's interests. * * *

We shall * * * be glad of any movement which shall result in the early decision of the question of the most practicable route and the early commencement and speedy completion of an interoceanic communication which shall be guaranteed in its perpetual neutralization and dedication to the commerce of all nations, without advantage to one over another of those who guarantee its assured neutrality.

Secretary of State Blaine's instructions to Mr. Lowell:

* * * Nor does the United States seek any exclusive or narrow commercial advantage. It frankly agrees and will by public proclamation declare at the proper time in conjunction with the Republic on whose soil the canal may be located that the same rights and privileges, the same tolls and obligations for the use of the canal shall apply with absolute impartiality to the merchant marine of every nation on the globe; and equally in time of peace the harmless use of the canal shall be freely granted to the war vessels of other nations.

President Cleveland, in his message of 1885, his first message to Congress, said:

* * * Whatever highway may be constructed across the barrier dividing the two greatest maritime areas of the world must be for the world's benefit—a trust for mankind, to be removed from the chance of domination by any single power, nor become a point of invitation for hostilities or a prize for warlike ambition. * * *

* * * These suggestions may serve to emphasize what I have already said on the score of the necessity of a neutralization of any interoceanic transit; and this can only be accomplished by making the uses of the route open to all nations and subject to the ambitions and warlike necessities of none.

I read from Secretary of State Olney's memorandum, 1896:

* * * That the interoceanic routes there specified should, under the sovereignty of the States traversed by them, be neutral and free to all nations alike. * * *

Then, in speaking of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, he said:

* * * Under these circumstances, upon every principle which governs the relations to each other, either by nations or of individuals, the United States is completely estopped from denying that the treaty is in full force and vigor.

President Roosevelt, in submitting the treaty, said:

It specifically provides—

I quote this for the special reason that it shows that no distinction in the measure of control or in the neutrality or equality of opportunity was contemplated when it was decided that this canal should be built by the United States.

* * * It specifically provides that the United States alone shall do the work of building and assume the responsibility of safeguarding the canal, and shall regulate its neutral use by all nations on terms of equality without the guaranty of interference of any outside nation from any quarter. * * *

Again he says, on January 4, 1904, in a special message:

* * * Under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, it was explicitly provided that the United States should control, police, and protect the canal which was to be built, keeping it open for the vessels of all nations on equal terms. The United States thus assumes the position of guarantor of the canal and of its peaceful use by all the world.

In a note by Secretary Hay on January 5, 1904, he states:

* * * The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was conceived to form an obstacle, and the British Government therefore agreed to abrogate it, the United States only promising in return to protect the canal and keep it open on equal terms to all nations, in accordance with our traditional policy.

That, I believe, is in Article I.

Article V guarantees neutrality.

Article VI engages to invite every State to enter into stipulations concerning the construction and maintenance of the canal for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all.

Before reading the provision in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, I think it desirable to trace the history of a controversy commencing in the year 1888 between the United States and Great Britain relating to canals in Canada.

By the treaty of 1854, known as the reciprocity treaty, which was abrogated or terminated in 1866, equal privilege was granted to the citizens of the United States and the citizens of Canada in the boundary waters and canals to the north of us. The right was given to Canada to navigate Lake Michigan on the same terms as those afforded to our shipping. In 1871 a provision was inserted with reference to these canals. As everyone will recognize, it is very desirable for the shipping of both countries to sail along the Great Lakes and Canadian waters without let or hindrance. There was inserted in the treaty of 1871 the following article:

ART. XXVII. The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the Government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion; and the Government of the United States engages that the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty shall enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States, and further engages to urge upon the State governments to secure to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty the use of the several State canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by or contiguous to the boundary line between the possessions of the high contracting parties on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

It will be noted that this is not an absolute agreement. It starts out by saying:

The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the Government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals.

It is not, then, a positive agreement that they should be open on equal terms to both. I refer to this as a matter of extreme importance, because it shows the basis of our contention in this particular case.

The Canadian Government imposed certain restrictions and discriminations, to wit: That while the tolls through the Welland Canal should be 20 cents per ton on west-bound freight, the tolls on east-bound freight, while the same, should be subject to a rebate of 18 cents, leaving the net tolls only 2 cents, if the boat went as far as Montreal; and that if on the course, say from Duluth, Chicago, or any other city, cargoes should be unloaded and loaded again, if that unloading and loading should be on Canadian territory the same rebate of 18 cents a ton should be granted. This gave a preference to the port of Montreal as compared with the ports of the United States on the Atlantic seaboard or on Lake Ontario.

On this subject President Cleveland, in a message of August 23, 1888, said:

I desire also to call the attention of the Congress to another subject involving such wrongs and unfair treatment to our citizens as, in my opinion, require prompt action.

The navigation of the Great Lakes and the immense business and carrying trade growing out of the same have been treated broadly and liberally by the United States Government and made free to all mankind, while Canadian railroads and navigation companies share in our country's transportation upon terms as favorable as are accorded to our own citizens.

The canals and other public works built and maintained by the Government along the line of the Lakes are made free to all.

In contrast to this condition and evincing a narrow and ungenerous commercial spirit, every lock and canal which is a public work of the Dominion of Canada is subject to tolls and charges.

By Article XXVII of the treaty of 1871 provision was made to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion of Canada on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, and to also secure to the subjects of Great Britain the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

The equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion which we were promised in the use of the canals of Canada did not secure to us freedom from tolls in their navigation—

I take it that it would be no violation of the treaty if the tolls were the same—

but we had a right to expect that we, being Americans and interested in American commerce, would be no more burdened in regard to the same than Canadians engaged in their own trade; and the whole spirit of the concession made was, or should have been, that merchandise and property transported to an American market through these canals should not be enhanced in its cost by tolls many times higher than such as were carried to an adjoining Canadian market. All our citizens, producers and consumers, as well as vessel owners, were to enjoy the equality promised.

And yet evidence has for some time been before the Congress, furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, showing that while the tolls charged in the first instance are the same to all, such vessels and cargoes as are destined to certain Canadian ports are allowed a refund of nearly the entire tolls, while those bound for American ports are not allowed any such advantage.

To promise equality and then in practice make it conditional upon our vessels doing Canadian business instead of their own is to fulfill a promise with the shadow of performance.

I recommend that such legislative action be taken as will give Canadian vessels navigating our canals, and their cargoes, precisely the advantages granted to our vessels and cargoes upon Canadian canals, and that the same be measured by exactly the same rule of discrimination.

The course which I have outlined and the recommendations made relate to the honor and dignity of our country and the protection and preservation of the rights and interests of all our people. A government does but half its duty when it protects its citizens at home and permits them to be imposed upon and humiliated by the unfair and overreaching disposition of other nations. If we invite our people to rely upon arrangements made for their benefit abroad, we should see to it that they are not deceived; and if we are generous and liberal to a neighboring country our people should reap the advantage of it by a return of liberality and generosity.

These are subjects which partisanship should not disturb or confuse. Let us survey the ground calmly and moderately; and having put aside other means of settlement, if we enter upon the policy of retaliation let us pursue it firmly with a determination only to subserve the interests of our people and maintain the high standard and the becoming pride of American citizenship.

At a later time, in the following month, President Cleveland communicated to Congress certain documents and referred to the breach of the engagement contained in the treaty of 1871, whereby Great Britain promised to the United States equality in the matter of such canal transportation.

President Harrison several times commented on this subject. In a message under date of February 23, 1892, he says:

In the matter of canal tolls our treaty rights were flagrantly disregarded.

In speaking of the discriminations practiced, he says in a message of June 20, 1892:

The report of Mr. Partridge, the Solicitor of the Department of State, which accompanies the letter of the Secretary of State, states these discriminations very clearly. That these orders as to canal tolls and rebates are in direct violation of Article XXVII of the treaty of 1871 seems to be clear. It is wholly evasive to say that there is no discrimination between Canadian and American vessels; that the rebate is allowed to both without favor upon grain carried through to Montreal or transshipped at a Canadian port to Montreal. The treaty runs:

"To secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion."

It was intended to give to consumers in the United States, to our people engaged in railroad transportation, and to those exporting from our ports equal terms in passing their merchandise through these canals. This absolute equality of treatment was the consideration for concessions on the part of this Government made in the same article of the treaty, and which have been faithfully kept.

It is a matter of regret that the Canadian Government has not responded promptly to our request for the removal of these discriminating tolls.

In another message, of July 1, 1892, he says:

There can be no doubt that a serious discrimination against our citizens and our commerce exists, and quite as little doubt that this discrimination is not the incident but the purpose of the Canadian regulation.

This question was taken up in Congress, and the House and Senate by a unanimous vote authorized the President to issue a proclamation to take steps in retaliation. In pursuance of this act, which was passed July 26, 1892, President Harrison, on the 18th of August, 1892, issued the following proclamation:

And whereas the Government of the Dominion of Canada imposes a toll amounting to about 20 cents per ton on all freight passing through the Welland Canal in transit to a port of the United States, and also a further toll on all vessels of the United States and on all passengers in transit to a port of the United States, all of which tolls are without rebate; and

Whereas the Government of the Dominion of Canada, in accordance with an order in council of April 4, 1892, refunds 18 cents per ton of the 20-cent toll at the Welland Canal on wheat, Indian corn, peas, barley, rye, oats, flaxseed, and buckwheat, upon condition that they are originally shipped for and carried to Montreal or some port east of Montreal for export, and that if transshipped at an intermediate point such transshipment is made within the Dominion of Canada, but allows no such nor any other rebate on said products when shipped to a port of the United States or when carried to Montreal for export if transshipped within the United States; and

Whereas the Government of the Dominion of Canada by said system of rebate and otherwise discriminates against the citizens of the United States in the use of said Welland Canal, in violation of the provisions of article 27 of the treaty of Washington concluded May 8, 1871; and

Whereas said Welland Canal is connected with the navigation of the Great Lakes, and I am satisfied that the passage through it of cargoes in transit to ports of the United States is made difficult and burdensome by said discriminating system of rebate and otherwise and is reciprocally unjust and unreasonable:

Now, therefore, I, Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States of America, by virtue of the power to that end conferred upon me by said act of Congress approved July 26, 1892, do hereby direct that from and after September 1, 1892, until further notice a toll of 20 cents per ton be levied, collected, and paid on all freight of whatever kind or description passing through the St. Marys Falls Canal in transit to any port of the Dominion of Canada, whether carried in vessels of the United States or of other nations; and to that extent I do hereby suspend from and after said date the right of free passage through said St. Marys Falls Canal of any and all cargoes or portions of cargoes in transit to Canadian ports.

This proclamation, reenforced, I take it, by diplomatic negotiations, led to an entire revocation of the regulations of the Canadian Government by order in council, so that equal privileges were afforded to the ships and the commerce of both nations. President Harrison refers to that fact in his annual message of 1892. President Cleveland alludes to it also in his message early in December, 1893.

Here was a clear enunciation of our policy on this subject. Here was asserted an interpretation of a treaty in which the language was—

The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the Government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals.

When the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 was framed the word "entire" was inserted before "equality." Instead of simply "equality," as here, this adjective was inserted so as to make it read "entire equality." There is no doubt but that those who framed the treaty, after a lapse of about nine years, had clearly in mind this controversy concerning the Welland Canal and the waterways of Canada.

Now, the question for the Senate is, Can we afford to make our policy as changeable as the figures of a kaleidoscope whenever it happens to suit our own interests? When we have throughout our entire history proclaimed to the world a line of policy which means neutrality and equality, can we sanction any measure which favors equality when it helps us and utterly ignore and disregard it when it may not prove to be for our interest?

Indeed, this very question of discrimination in favor of domestic commerce was brought before the Senate when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was under discussion. It was proposed to strike out article 3 and substitute the following:

The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of charges for traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.

The proposition was placed squarely before the Senate, when this treaty providing for entire equality was under consideration, by this proposed amendment, to the effect that the United States would reserve the right "to discriminate in respect of charges for traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade."

Mr. SHIVELY. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. Was that substitute offered in the Senate?

Mr. BURTON. It was offered in the Senate. It is found in the executive document to which I referred.

Mr. SHIVELY. And it was voted down?

Mr. BURTON. The record of it appears on page 15 of Senate Document 85, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session. It was an amendment proposed by Senator Bard, of California, and was determined in the negative—yeas 27, nays 43.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The question which has occurred to me is whether this is equality. The United States is spending perhaps in the neighborhood of $500,000,000. The other nations of the earth are not spending a penny. We are taking the responsibility of building fortifications there, of policing it, and of maintaining a government. Is it equality as far as the relation between the United States and other governments is concerned for us to be so philanthropic and sentimental that we are going to pay out all that money for the benefit of all the other nations of the earth and allow them to have absolutely as much privilege there as we have ourselves? It seems to me that it is more than equality; that it is a discrimination against ourselves.

Mr. BURTON. The answer to that suggestion is that after the method of construction was determined, after it was understood and even known that it was to be built by the United States at its expense instead of by private enterprise, precisely the same rules were applied to it as would have been applied in case it had been constructed by private capital. That very subject was under consideration and thoroughly understood when President Roosevelt sent in his message in 1904.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If that rule is to prevail all the way through, what right have we to build fortifications down there?

Mr. BURTON. That right was secured.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Not in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty?

Mr. BURTON. The right to fortify was forbidden by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and was under long discussion at that time. It rests, if it exists at all, in the right, I take it, to police and protect the canal. The general right and custody over it is secured by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I have not the clause before me just at this time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that the question asked by the Senator from South Dakota was fully answered by Senator Davis in his report upon the original Hay-Pauncefote treaty—the question as to whether our investing the money and having the control would justify us in allowing our own vessels to go through free. He took the position squarely that our investment was the matter of an investment for our own benefit, that we were presumed to get a benefit from the use of the canal and from the tolls, and that would not justify us to make a different arrangement or agreement other than that which we entered into in the treaty, namely, that the vessels of all nations should be treated exactly the same, putting it on the same footing, exactly as if it was a private enterprise.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator from Ohio concede that the United States may send its warships through the canal free?

Mr. BURTON. I do not see how it can, unless special regulations apply to warships. That question, however, does not assume importance because the United States, the owner of the warships, would pay the tolls to itself, the owner of the canal. That is a very different question, however, from ships that are engaged in commerce in competition with other nations. As far as this discussion is concerned, I do not regard the question relating to warships as really having any bearing. That would be a question not of equality but of neutrality.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator please tell me what he means by neutrality as applied to this canal as distinguished from equality? I should like to have the Senator's definition.

Mr. BURTON. Neutrality requires that all ships shall have the same rights to pass through—warships and commercial ships—that no one nation, the one constructing it or any other, should have any advantage in that regard. Equality requires that the tolls and burdens shall be the same; that the terms of use shall be the same for all.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator suggested a moment ago that when this treaty was before the Senate the proposition to favor our coastwise trade was voted down. Does the Senator contend that the argument was made then that it would be a violation of the treaty, or, rather, was it included and understood?

Mr. BURTON. Clearly it must have been discussed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It was discussed in the Senate at that time, and my understanding from the reading of it was that many, at least, of those opposed to the amendment insisted that the terms of the treaty provided that the United States could care for the coastwise trade that was not participated in by a foreign country, and no right was taken from the foreign country either before or after the treaty was made, as far as participating in the coastwise trade was concerned.

Mr. BURTON. I think it would be difficult for the Senator from Michigan to find any such argument advanced at that time. A fact that throws light on the question is this: Two bills were introduced, one by the Senator from Maine, Mr. Frye, and the other by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], providing for a repayment to boats engaged in the domestic trade of the amount of tolls that were collected, taking it for granted that the tolls must be paid under the treaty, and endeavoring in that indirect way to secure an equivalent rebate to the domestic coastwise trade.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not quite catch one of the questions of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]. He may have asked the question, but it occurred to me when the Senator was discussing it that there is another question which was considered in regard to this treaty, namely, that of fortifications, and that also was voted down, was it not?

Mr BURTON. I am not aware that that subject was brought to a vote at that time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am very certain that it was discussed, and there was a vote had and the proposition to fortify the canal was defeated by a vote 27 ayes, 44 nays. Yet the Senator from Ohio will not contend now that under the treaty the United States can not fortify the canal?

Mr. BURTON. We may fortify the canal, as I said, on the theory that the United States is the guardian to protect it, on the theory of protecting it against attack and enforcing its equitable use.

I do not believe we have any right to fortify it for the purpose of exacting tolls from foreign ships for our own benefit.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is one point more. The Senator has been discussing very intelligently, and I am greatly interested in his discussion, the matter of our Canadian treaty, the one of 1854 and the later one of 1871. The treaty mentioned in terms the United States and Canada. No other nation or nations could participate in those canals, but the whole subject matter of the treaty applies to the two nations, not to the world in general, as the Panama Canal does.

Mr. BURTON. But the Senator from Michigan will recognize——

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator will permit me, he suggests that we laid down and established a policy at that time which we can not depart from now. Our contract in express terms at that time was in relation to trade for the use of those waterways by the two signatory powers. It was an equal arrangement between the two powers in express terms and included no others. The United States could not insist on less than the exact letter of the treaty covering the only subject matter that they had under consideration.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Michigan, however, will concede that an agreement which is general in its application to all nations without limit is just as binding as an agreement between two nations. The question is, Was there an agreement or not? In the other case there was one involving two nations. In this case there is one involving all nations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. I would suggest to the Senator that in the treaty which was made in regard to the Canadian canal there was a consideration that the Canadians should use our canals and we should use theirs. The conditions under which this commerce is to be carried on are entirely different from those with Canada. It seems to me that it is not at all a parallel case.

Mr. BURTON. You can not, Mr. President, in international agreements weigh carefully the adequacy of the consideration. But there was a consideration in this case, and that was the surrender of the advantages secured to Great Britain by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which we had considerable difficulty in removing from our path.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio what is a very grave question, I think, in this whole matter. I should like to know from the Senator from Ohio what advantages were secured by the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—what there was in that treaty regarded as a serious obstacle that had to be removed?

Mr. BURTON. The right to equal participation which they asserted. In a moment I will read from that treaty.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that not only was there an agreement under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that each nation would have the same right with reference to a Panama Canal, but Great Britain had obtained from Nicaragua a right to construct a canal of her own volition across the Isthmus. The United States had an equal right from Colombia to construct a canal, and Great Britain under this treaty relinquished her right to construct a canal without the consent of the United States across the Nicaraguan route, while the United States obtained the right to construct it and to prohibit Great Britain from doing likewise.

Mr. BURTON. I am much obliged to the Senator from North Dakota for the suggestion. It gives the general idea of the treaty:

> The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal—

Right there in terms—

> That neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal; agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same, or in the vicinity thereof; or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have to or with any State or people for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same; nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess, with any State or Government through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other.

That is, I take it, the main point. The sentiment of this country, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] will recollect, was for a canal owned and controlled absolutely by the United States. A resolution was introduced here in the latter part of the session of 1898–1899 providing for a commission to recommend to Congress plans for the construction of a canal under the ownership and control of the United States. Our policy pointed in that direction.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. And, if the Senator will allow me, for a time those commissioners refused to negotiate with the French Panama Canal Co. because that company was unwilling to convey a title giving to the United States exclusive ownership and control.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Ohio has said that all the provisions of the treaty from which he has just read contemplate a canal built and maintained by private owners or through private enterprise. Is it the view of the Senator from Ohio that if the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had remained in force the Government of the United States could not have built for itself and operated for itself a canal across the Isthmus of Panama?

Mr. BURTON. The treaty reads:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal.

So far as Panama is concerned, I regard that question as rather academic for the reason that at the time it was the general expectation that the canal would be constructed along the Nicaraguan route.

Mr. CUMMINS. I realize that, Mr. President, but I wanted to get the Senator's idea of the consideration which we really received. The Senator says, and I will accept it for the purpose of this debate, that the United States could not have built a canal, either across the Isthmus of Nicaragua or the Isthmus of Panama, without the consent of Great Britain, and in order to get it we abrogated that treaty and made the treaty of 1901. Is that the view of the Senator?

Mr. BURTON. It is a little more than the consent. It is an absolute agreement not to build it:

Neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal.

It is a prohibition against building it in the first instance and a prohibition against getting control by foreign capital.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator from Ohio, of course, recognizes that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was not made to prevent the building of a canal.

Mr. BURTON. It was made with the idea that both should have equality——

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. But it was not made with the idea that neither country would build the canal. It was made with the idea that somebody would build the canal, and each country agreed that it would not undertake to become the manager—would not undertake to have exclusive control of it so built; but I did not know, and I asked for information, that it was ever claimed that this was a prohibition forever upon the United States against the building of a canal, either through Central or South America.

Mr. BURTON. Certainly it sounds very much like that. The understanding at that time no doubt was that if either country built the canal they would have exclusive control over it. Such exclusive control is denied by this article.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to call attention also to another manifestation of our diplomatic——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. On the subject which the Senator from Iowa raises, in reading article 1, the Senator will see that however narrow the language may be as to the location of the canal, the contract, the undertaking never to fortify any part of that country, extends to any part of Central America, and if the Clayton-Bulwer treaty were still in force we would certainly be precluded from any right to fortify the present canal.

Mr. ROOT. May I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that it goes a little further than fortifying? It is:

That neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same, or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify——

Mr. BACON. Or colonize.

Mr. ROOT (reading)— or colonize, or assume, or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America.

The dominion which we have found necessary for the construction of the canal was excluded.

Mr. BACON. That you neither exercise the dominion military or civil, or ever fortify any part of it, even though it may not be along the Nicaragua River and Managua Lake.

Mr. CUMMINS. In response to the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia I beg to say that the United States did not acquire in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty any right to fortify the canal or any part of it.

Mr. BACON. No; but we did get a release from an obligation not to do it.

Mr. CUMMINS. While I believe it is wise to fortify it, I have never been able to find a justification for it, save in the general principles of government.

I have never been able to find that authority which seemed to move the other House and the Senate when the policy of fortification was entered upon. I am in favor of fortification simply because I am in favor of the United States holding its own and being able to defend its own against all comers, and I suppose fortification is necessary to preserve the very neutrality of which the Senator from Ohio has spoken.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator from Ohio, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if he also is as indifferent to the necessity——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We can not hear the Senator over here, and we want to hear him.

Mr. BACON. I was inquiring of the Senator from Iowa, he having announced his indifference to the right to fortify this canal, whether he was equally indifferent to the exercise of the right of dominion over the Canal Zone, a right which we could not exercise if the Clayton-Bulwer treaty were in force.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Georgia about that. I did not ask my question on the assumption that there was no consideration in the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but I wanted the Senator from Ohio to state precisely what that consideration was, in order to ascertain whether it bears any relation whatsoever to the matter under discussion, namely, the right of equality in tolls.

Mr. BURTON. That is, whether there was any consideration?

Mr. CUMMINS. Whether there was such a situation under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as required the United States to agree with Great Britain that the United States should charge no more for the ships of other countries than for her own. I only wanted to make that clear.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator from Ohio, I will say that I do not think the Senator from Iowa correctly states the question. As I understand the question suggested by the Senator from Iowa, it is this: Whether there were any such existing conditions as would require that we should grant equality of use of the canal to all nations? I do not think that is the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. But——

Mr. BACON. Pardon me a moment. As I understand the question, it is this: Whether there were at the time certain restraints upon us by reason of our contract through the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as were of so grave a character as to make it a matter of importance that we should be relieved from them, and whether, in securing that relief, we did enter, or did not enter, into a certain contract—not whether the conditions required us to enter into it, but whether we deemed the advantage which we were to gain of sufficient importance to enter into that contract, and did enter into it. That is the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I asked the Senator from Ohio to state what there was in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that made it necessary from the viewpoint of the United States to abrogate it in order that we might build that canal? He stated the objection, and it has been reiterated by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and I think everybody realizes it. I only wanted that obstacle to be clearly defined in order that we might see its relation, if it has any, to the present controversy.

I have not made up my mind with regard to the proper interpretation of this treaty, but I hope the Senator from Ohio will not take it for granted that we did agree with Great Britain that her ships should pass through this canal upon the same terms imposed upon the ships of the United States. That is the very question to be decided, for, if we did, we must keep to our word and perform religiously the obligation we have undertaken; but the question with me is—and I suggest it to the Senator from Ohio—whether the words "all nations" embrace the United States, or whether they embrace only the other nations of the world in whose behalf we were making an agreement with Great Britain.

Mr. BURTON. First, on the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the question is asked, Was there enough gained by its abrogation to create a consideration? To repeat what I have already said, that treaty in its very first article declared that—neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal.

In constructing the canal contemplated in 1901 it was our desire to exercise exclusive control over the canal, to build it and to operate it ourselves. So that clause was in the way.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. Was not the abrogation of that provision necessary in order that the canal might be constructed?

Mr. BURTON. In order that it should be constructed at all?

Mr. BRISTOW. Constructed by the United States Government. Without that it could not have been constructed?

Mr. BURTON. No; it could not have been constructed in that way.

Mr. BRISTOW. It could not have been constructed at all by the United States. So that treaty had to be abrogated in order that the canal might be constructed. It does not seem to me that that can operate as a reason why we must give other nations the same privileges that we ourselves exercise in regard to our own property.

Mr. BURTON. It was a question whether the canal should be constructed by private enterprise or by this Government. For reasons which were accepted as sufficient by Congress at the time—and I recall very well that the question was much discussed whether it should be constructed by a private corporation or by the Government—it was deemed most advisable for the United States Government to do it. Certain private corporations had undertaken it; they had been incorporated, and then had failed to do anything. More or less scandal had been associated with their acts. We were anxious to construct the canal, and we virtually said "after all these failures the Federal Government, with its power and resources, will now enter upon this work." At the very outset we were met by a treaty provision—

That neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal.

The resolution which was made a part of the river and harbor appropriation bill of March 3, 1899, was rendered absolutely futile. We could not go ahead as that resolution contemplated and build the canal ourselves with that treaty provision directly in the way. The question as to whether it was wise for the Government to build or leave it to private enterprise was entirely foreclosed by the action of Congress—

Agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same or in the vicinity thereof—

That also had to be removed—or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume, or exercise any domain over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America—

That too, had to be eliminated if we were to exercise control over the canal after it was constructed—nor will either make use of any protection, which either affords or may afford, or any alliance, which either has or may have, to or with any State or people for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same.

I think really the best answer to this question is to read the treaty itself. It was full of troublesome conditions.

Furthermore, it is not altogether a question as to whether or not there was a consideration. Rather it is a question of the solemn faith of this Government. Did we agree to do this? We did agree; and having before us for consideration a treaty in which the word "equality" occurred, we inserted and agreed to the word "entire," as still further emphasizing the idea of "equality."

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Ohio will not overlook the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, that there is a difference of opinion as to whether such an agreement was made, so far as our commerce and that of England or of other nations is concerned.

Mr. BURTON. That is, whether it applies to us at all or merely refers to other countries?

Mr. BRISTOW. There are many who contend that the language means that we agreed that the canal should be neutral between all nations—it is our own property—and that the term "all nations" includes the nations of the world, but does not include ourselves, because we are dealing, not with a canal that is owned by a third party, but with a canal which we ourselves own and have as a nation constructed. The theory is advanced by a great many that it was a pledge that this property of ours should be neutral and not be used so as to embarrass one nation as against another.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator, I presume, refers to the provision in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I think it would be a very strange construction, if I may be permitted to suggest, that such a general expression as "all nations" includes every nation except the United States, even though the United States should have been the constructor of the canal.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BURTON. I should like to answer the question of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] before yielding to any further interruption. Article 1 of the treaty reads:

ARTICLE I. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present convention, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

Now comes section 1 of article 3, which reads:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules—

Which are very much like those pertaining to the Suez Canal—on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senator from Ohio would not contend that that language would include the United States in case of a war in which the United States was itself engaged, would he?

Mr. BURTON. Well, I think it would, unless it is held that treaties are suspended by war.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then, if that be true, we should carry that exclusive construction through the entire treaty, and we would not have the right to revictual one of our own ships of war in that canal, if the United States is included in the broad terms used here, "vessels of war of a belligerent." That language might include the vessels of war belonging to the United States in time of war.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, of course it is a collateral question, which anyone would hesitate to answer, as to what would happen in case of a war in which the United States was engaged. War ships of the contending nation would no doubt hesitate very much about going there; they would feel that in some mysterious way they would suffer injury by passing through that canal. But, according to its terms, it is put on the same plane with the Suez Canal, with no discrimination in favor of the United States. The question of what would happen in time of war may be discussed, but the result would probably be that ships of any contending nation would keep away and ours would pass through. In the midst of war laws are silent, and the right to go through might be denied under the emergency; but, according to its terms, it seems to me the treaty is made to apply alike to the warships of all countries, including our own.

Mr. CRAWFORD. We have said over and over again, not privately, but publicly and everywhere, that the real purpose of building this canal was to increase the efficiency of our fleet in time of war and to add to it mobility and usefulness. Now, if we are to be so careful that we are to make no use of this canal that all other nations are not to enjoy with entire equality, as the Senator says, it seems to me we have built it under a great misapprehension.

Mr. BURTON. It is thought by some that the canal was built merely as a warlike enterprise; that was the motive of many; but I look at it merely as a great commercial enterprise for promoting the commerce of the world; and while vessels of another nation at war with us theoretically would have the right to go through the canal, practically they would not do so. That is about what would happen.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio will pardon me a moment, it is a general principle of international law, is it not, that when war breaks out between two countries all existing treaties are thereby abrogated?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; inter arma silent leges.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If war broke out between the United States and France, let us say, of course the treaty, so far as France was concerned, or so far as it protected France, would be abrogated and put to an end, and her war vessels could not pass through the canal; but the war vessels of other countries at peace with both of us would still be protected by the treaty.

Mr. BURTON. I am inclined to think the Senator from Mississippi is correct in his statement in regard to that.

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. ROOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota, who was first on his feet.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I suggest to the Senator that the report of the majority when this treaty was before the Senate conceded that the intent and purpose was that it should cover our coastwise trade and should bind the Government of the United States, as well as that of Great Britain, in the matter of tolls? The minority of the committee conceded that that was the proper construction, and no one in the Senate during the entire debate ever claimed, as I remember, that the United States was not considered as included in the expression "all nations."

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, on the subject which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has mentioned as to the effect of war putting an end to rights under treaties, of course, there has been a great deal of discussion about that; but I do not think there is any doubt whatever that so far as promissory treaties go—that is, treaties which rest in contract as to the future—the contract is abrogated by war.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By the existence of war.

Mr. ROOT. During the war—while treaties which are in the nature of executed conveyances may stand and their title may not be disturbed. Any treaty which undertakes that something shall be done or shall not be done in the future by one country in respect of another, is either suspended by war or terminated forever by war. So that no nation claiming the benefit of this executory provision could continue to claim it after a state of war between that nation and the United States existed.

Mr. BURTON. In other words, they could not claim the right to go through the canal in case of war with the United States.

Mr. ROOT. No; war abrogates the right.

Mr. BURTON. That is a question, Mr. President, which I had not considered in this connection; but——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the language of the treaty. Section 1, of article 3, is in exactly the language the Senator has just read, only I want to read a little more, and I invite his attention to the words used:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules.

Exactly the same language is used in relation to commercial vessels as to war vessels. If upon the declaration of war between the United States and any other country the United States is relieved as a matter of general international law from the provisions of the treaty, why is the word "war" put in there? The fact that this language is identical as to vessels of war and of commerce certainly makes it refer to other nations. We agree that it shall be neutral as to other nations. If the treaty is abrogated by the declaration of war anyway, then the provision is of no use there so far as war vessels are concerned. Why is the same language used as to vessels of commerce and of war? It can not, according to the Senator's own construction, refer to our own war vessels. Then, how can it refer to our own commercial vessels?

Mr. ROOT. They are not our own.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio will pardon me a moment, the Senator from Kansas seems to proceed along the line of thought that vessels of war do not exist during times of peace. This provides for vessels of war. The Senator seems also to lose sight of the fact that the United States might be at war with one power of the earth and not with any other nation at that time. During war not only could the vessels of war of the party with whom we are at war not pass through the canal, but her vessels of commerce could not pass through, because during the war this promise between the two parties ceases to exist; the treaties between the two parties are at an end during the war; but meanwhile there would be vessels of war, and plenty of them, belonging to other nations that would be protected, notwithstanding the war between the United States and France, let us say, or, if the United States and Great Britain were at war, certainly during that war, if we had the power on the canal, we would have the war right to prevent, not only the war vessels of Great Britain, but the commercial vessels of Great Britain, from going through the canal, though meanwhile the other nations at peace with us would still be protected by the treaty in its every line. There are a hundred treaty obligations toward aliens that cease the moment they become alien enemies and war is going on.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does the Senator contend that during a time of war the United States would have to pay toll on its war vessels going through the canal?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, I do not think that has any special bearing upon this controversy. I presume that the condition of war would suspend all rules and regulations as regards that question.

Mr. BRISTOW. In regard to the canal?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; so far as war vessels are concerned.

Mr. BRISTOW. In regard to all nations or merely in regard to our own Nation?

Mr. BURTON. In regard to our own Nation, all regulations would be suspended practically by war.

Mr. BRISTOW. Then, if the Senator's construction is correct, and we would not be required when we were at war with other nations to pay tolls on our own war vessels that might go through the canal, that is clearly a discrimination as against the war vessels of other nations with whom we are not engaged in war.

Mr. BURTON. The trouble with the question of the Senator from Kansas is this: He puts a condition of war, exceptional in all international law, a condition during which all rules are suspended, on the same footing with the general question of commerce, applicable under well-understood rules everywhere and under all circumstances.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will pardon me, if all the rules would be abrogated in case of war, the abrogation would apply to commercial ships as well as to warships, because commercial ships are included in the same paragraph; and if the Senator's application of the language is correct, then we would not be bound to collect tolls from our own vessels in time of war, while we could collect tolls from vessels of other countries.

Mr. BURTON. I am inclined to think that in case of war we would not be hesitating long on a little question like tolls for going through the canal. It does not seem to me that that has any very considerable bearing on the question before us.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, if I may make a suggestion regarding the question asked by the Senator from Kansas, the Senator from Kansas has used the term "our own vessels" indiscriminately as applied to two quite distinct classes. A country owns its war vessels; they belong to the Government. The country that owns a canal can not pay toll on its own war vessels, because it pays toll to itself; but when you speak of commercial vessels, the Government does not own them. We say they are our vessels. They are American vessels, or they are British vessels, or they are German vessels, not because they belong to the United States or to Great Britain or to Germany, but because they belong to citizens of those countries, and they have the ascribed nationality of those countries. The owners of those vessels can pay toll to the owner of the canal though that owner be their own country. In that case there is a real change of title to the money which is paid in the way of tolls; and, so far as all those vessels go which are not the property of the owner of the canal, the language of this clause would seem to require that vessels belonging to a man who is an American citizen and vessels belonging to a man who is a British subject should be put upon an entire equality. The support of this provision of the bill must rest upon limiting by construction the general language of this clause, and for the construction which imposes that limitation some affirmative justification would seem to be required.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator, then, concedes that, if the United States Government owns commercial vessels of its own, they could pass through the canal without the payment of tolls?

Mr. ROOT. It would simply be a matter of bookkeeping, because the United States Government as the owner of a vessel would be paying to the United States Government as the owner of the canal. It would not be a payment. It makes no difference whether you take up your dollar bill from one place and put it in another or take it from one agency and put it in the hands of another agent, it would not be a payment. No one can pay anything to himself.

Mr. BRISTOW. That was my understanding. I beg the pardon of the Senator from Ohio for taking so much time, but I want to read paragraph 2.

Mr. BURTON. From what page of the canal hearings is the Senator reading?

Mr. BRISTOW. From page 267 of Senate Document No. 191:

The canal shall never be blockaded—

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I ask a question before the Senator leaves the other point?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was interested in what the Senator from New York [Mr. Root] stated, that the United States could not pay anything to itself, and I should like to ask him, if the United States should put on a fleet of commercial vessels to engage in our coastwise trade, would Great Britain consider that we had complied with the terms of the treaty as interpreted by the Senator from New York?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I can not say what would satisfy Great Britain; I am not representing Great Britain.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I was very much interested in the interpretation of the Senator from New York. While I do not agree with him as to the term "all nations," including our own nation as well as other nations, I am glad that he concedes that we would not be expected to collect tolls from ships which the United States Government individually owns. I desire now to read paragraph 2 of section 1, article 3:

The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

Now, it is a fact, which the Senator well knows, that we are constructing at the termini of this canal the most powerful fortifications the United States Government will own. Guns have been contracted for to be placed on the Pacific side that, so I am told, have a range of more than 20 miles.

Now, if the language of the treaty is to be construed so technically, what right have we to blockade that canal? What are the guns for? They are not to be used by a police force.

Mr. BURTON. That, I think, comes up in another connection rather than here. I understand there has recently been some discussion on that subject. Certainly there was some discussion a year or two ago as to our right to fortify the canal.

But, not to pass entirely from that point, I take it the ground for it is the general police regulation and right of protection over the canal.

Mr. President, in closing I wish to call attention to a negotiation by Mr. Secretary Hay, which is probably the latest expression of our policy in cases like this. It is in regard to the open door in China.

Three nations—the French, the English, the German—had spheres of influence there; territorial concessions of unequal size. Russia and Japan also, by their propinquity, had great influence over the Chinese Empire, and, especially with Russia, the matter of railroad ownership was involved in the question. In a note sent by him on the 6th day of September, 1899, to the Governments of Great Britain, Germany, and Russia; on November 17, 1899, to the Government of Italy; and on December 26, 1899, to the Government of China, he referred to activities of those powers in obtaining "spheres of influence" in China by leases and agreements among themselves and with China. Secretary Hay requested a formal assurance from each power within its "sphere of influence" that—

Third. That it will levy no higher harbor dues on vessels of another nationality, and no higher railroad charges over lines built, controlled, or operated within its "sphere" on merchandise belonging to citizens or subjects of other nationalities transported through such "sphere" than shall be levied on similar merchandise belonging to its own nationals transported over equal distances.

That was our request of those nations in the year 1899, although they had fleets and armies there and large spheres of influence and large investments in railway building and along other lines.

The proposal of Secretary Hay met with a favorable reception by the powers addressed, and replies were received from each expressing a willingness to adhere to the declaration, providing the same action were taken by the other powers. When all the replies were received Secretary Hay, on March 20, 1900, addressed a circular note to our ambassadors, instructing them to convey to the ministers of foreign affairs of the Governments concerned the sincere gratification of the President at the successful termination of these negotiations.

This instance is directly applicable to this question. The demand acceded to by those nations was that the foothold they were gaining in the Flowery Kingdom, advantages secured by years and years of diplomacy and in some cases by war, the advantages gained by large investment, were to be afforded to our citizens, the people of the United States, in the same manner in which they were enjoyed by Russia or by England or by France or any other country.

Mr. President, I submit that in the light of such a demand as that and in the face of such a policy it is inconsistent for us to seek to exempt our coastwise traffic or our foreign traffic from the burden of tolls on the Panama Canal.

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator from Ohio takes his seat, and right in connection with the discussion as to whether or not the United States is bound by this treaty as are other nations, I want to call attention to a certain provision which I think very clearly recognizes the fact that it is so bound.

Mr. BURTON. I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. BACON. There are six rules laid down to be observed by the nations. The question is whether the United States is one of those nations to be thus bound. The language of the first of the rules is the one which has been commented upon, and is in these words:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Then follow five other rules. Now, the question is whether those rules were intended to apply to the United States, not only the one I have read, but all the other five, as well as to all other nations.

I wish to call attention to one of the other provisions of this treaty which seems to recognize very distinctly that the United States were to be bound by these rules, and that is found by the second article which precedes the rules. That article is in this language:

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

Mr. President, if the purpose was not to have the United States bound by the six rules, that language would have been entirely unnecessary. It would have been sufficient to say:

And the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

In fact, I could go further and say that the entire part of the clause could have been omitted, because if the United States Government is not bound by six rules, there is no reason to specify certain rights that she would have the power to enjoy, which might be considered to be in conflict with those rules. It would not be necessary to make any qualification whatever. In that case it would have been an indirect recognition that they were not bound by the rules. But the qualification made in the second article is an express recognition of it. It says:

And that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty.

What are the provisions of the present treaty? They are found in article 3. There are only three articles as to the construction, management, and operation of the canal. Article 4 is as to change of territorial sovereignty and the fifth article is as to ratification.

So when the treaty speaks of "subject to the provisions of the present treaty" it can refer only to the provisions found in article 3, which lay down rules—the six rules—and if they were not subject to it then it was not necessary to say that the enjoyment of all the rights incident to such construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal should be subject to the provisions of the present treaty unless the provisions of the present treaty apply to the United States.

It seems to me, Mr. President, so far from its being true that the language would imply that it did not include the United States as found in the provisions of the six rules, that here in the second article is an express recognition of the fact that the United States are subject to the six rules, and that certain rights may be enjoyed by them subject to that obligation.

Mr. BURTON. I thank the Senator from Georgia for his suggestion. I have already embodied in my remarks the language of that section, and have called attention especially to the words "subject to the provisions of the present treaty."

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not hear him.

Mr. BURTON. But the Senator from Georgia has elaborated the matter much more clearly than I did.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, before the Senator from Ohio passes from this subject I should like to ask him if he has considered the fact that other nations could not be prejudiced, and would have no substantial right to complain, if the United States permitted vessels engaged in the coastwise trade to go through the canal without charge of toll. The coastwise trade is one enjoyed exclusively by American ships, and can not be engaged in by any foreign vessels. So that so far as any substantial infringement of the treaty is concerned, there would be none.

Mr. BURTON. What seems to me to be a conclusive answer to that proposition is this: An agreement is an agreement; and it does not lie in the mouth of any country to say: "Oh, well, this will not hurt you. We will put our own interpretation upon this treaty."

But I do not think the Senator's conclusion is altogether correct. In our contention in 1890–91 we maintained that the provision relating to reciprocal use of Canadian canals in the treaty with Great Britain was not merely for the benefit of our shipping, but that it was for the protection of the rights of our citizens as well, and to prevent discrimination and disadvantages in trade. It did not refer merely to the sailing of ships, but in a broad sense covered our national interests.

Now, let us see whether or not free tolls for coastwise ships would create any disadvantage to foreign nations. This is a matter to which I refer with some unwillingness, because it sounds as if I were taking a position rather to the disadvantage of our own country. Nevertheless, it is well to state the facts.

Suppose there were a demand in San Francisco for an article for which there were two competing sources of supply; one in New York or on the Atlantic seaboard and the other in Hamburg or Liverpool. Would not removing the tolls on coastwise ships, in violation of this treaty, inure to the disadvantage of the nation which had the competing supply?

There is another case to which I may refer, viz: Certain classes of freight may be readily transshipped and will not necessarily be carried to destination in the ships in which originally loaded. Porto Rico is within the operation of our navigation laws. Suppose a cargo should be shipped from Liverpool or Bremen to San Juan, P. R., in a foreign bottom, and then should be unloaded, and loaded into a domestic ship. Suppose, instead of continuing in a boat that must pay tolls, it should go into a boat which, under the provisions of this bill, would pay no tolls. Would that be in accordance with the letter and spirit of this treaty? Would it not be a violation of it?

It is well, while we are on that subject, to remember that there is a Canadian Atlantic coast and a Canadian Pacific coast. The commerce between the Atlantic and the Pacific is largely a competing one. Under this provision the ships of the United States would be free from tolls and those of Canada would be subject to the payment of tolls.

As I said, I state these things with some hesitancy, because they point out certain disadvantages to our trade. But it is well that we should frankly discuss this matter in all its aspects and give the facts in regard to them. I still adhere, however, to what I said first: That it is our duty to observe a treaty in its entirety, and not to seek to evade it by saying, "Oh, well, it will not hurt you; we have certain privileges here."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question. The Senator says an agreement is an agreement and should be strictly lived up to. I should like to ask the Senator whether we have an agreement with England that American ships shall not be discriminated against when passing through the Suez Canal?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; the same agreement which is contained in this treaty in regard to Panama.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator consider that the payment by England of a subsidy to English vessels going through the Suez Canal is a discrimination against America?

Mr. BURTON. The difficulty about that statement is that, except as to mail steamers, it is not true.

Mr. SMOOT. I also wish to ask the Senator whether he believes that if the American Government should pay a subsidy to American ships that would be a discrimination against foreign governments?

Mr. BURTON. No; because that is a matter of general policy. The Peninsular & Oriental Steamship Co. receives payment for carrying the mails. Its ships go through the Suez Canal. There is one rival company, I believe, which also receives payment. It is not a subsidy in the sense in which the word is used in this country. It is not true that the Government of Great Britain pays to any ship a rebate of the tolls through the Suez Canal. If it happens that the mail pay amounts to about the same as the tolls it is merely a matter of coincidence.

Mr. SMOOT. But it always happens that way.

Mr. BURTON. Every country pays for the transportation of its mails.

Mr. SMOOT. Where a subsidy is granted to an English ship for carrying the mail, it applies not only to the mail but to the merchandise carried by the ship, although it may be specifically stated to be for the mail only.

Mr. BURTON. It is not a subsidy. It is payment for a service, just as carrying freight or passengers is paid for. It may be called a subsidy.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator may not call it a subsidy, but it seems to me it amounts to the same thing. But what I want to ask the Senator is this: Suppose this Government should decide to pay a ship subsidy to American vessels passing through the Panama Canal. Would the Senator say that was a violation of the treaty between England and America?

Mr. BURTON. Not in the letter; but I should be very doubtful whether it was not really a violation. It would depend upon whether it was a subsidy granted for building up trade, or whether it just about equaled the toll. It would depend upon a variety of circumstances.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I may ask the Senator from Ohio a question there, would it not also depend upon whether it was a general bounty or subsidy, on the one hand, or whether, on the other hand, it was a special bounty or subsidy confined entirely to ships going through the Panama Canal?

Mr. BURTON. That would be an important question. I suppose a country desiring to promote its trade in some particular direction could agree to pay a subsidy that way and not in other ways without violating treaty stipulations such as this. For instance, if we desired to pay a subsidy to boats going to South America and none to boats going to Europe, we could do it. If we desired to pay a subsidy to boats going through this canal to the Pacific coast of South America, we could do so. That, however, is an altogether different question from this.

I especially desire that there shall be no misunderstanding in regard to the question raised by the Senator from Utah. There is no English regulation providing for a rebate to English vessels equal to the tolls charged for passing through the Suez Canal. Three countries, however, do pursue the policy of granting a subsidy which is practically the equivalent of the canal tolls or charges. Those countries are Austria-Hungary, Russia, and Sweden.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before the Senator takes his seat, let me ask him a question. With reference to the Panama Canal, would not this really be the determining factor—if the subsidy was honestly intended as a subsidy to the vessel——

Mr. BURTON. That is, for building up trade.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It would not be repugnant to the treaty? But if it was intended merely as a subterfuge, the real object being to return the tolls through the Panama Canal, it would violate the provisions of the treaty.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Georgia states in an excellent form the distinction between the two propositions.

Mr. ROOT obtained the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, before the Senator from Ohio takes his seat, I want to suggest that his remarks, as to Canadian commerce and the coastwise commerce of the United States, may be misunderstood. The Canadian vessels that are engaged in Canadian commerce can not handle the coastwise commerce of our own country—that is, a Canadian vessel can not take a cargo at New York and land it at San Francisco. It can take it and land it at a Canadian Pacific port.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. But not if that cargo was destined for an American living in the United States.

Mr. BURTON. I thought I made that clear. I said there was an Atlantic coast in Canada, and a Pacific coast in Canada as well.

Mr. BRISTOW. But they are not competitors in any sense.

Mr. BURTON. However, freight can be shipped by railroad from one country to the other. Take the Puget Sound region, which is only a short distance from Vancouver. The same is true with reference to Portland and Halifax. It seems to me that would constitute a violation of the purpose of the treaty.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator a question. Suppose a shipload of lumber was to be taken by an American vessel from Seattle to New York, and another shipload of lumber was to be taken by a Canadian vessel from Victoria to New York, would it not be a discrimination against the Canadian vessel if it could not compete for the New York trade by reason of not having the same toll through the canal as the American vessel?

Mr. BURTON. Of course the boat from Vancouver or Victoria could land its cargo at New York as well as the one from Seattle, as it would be going from one country to the other. In the case of the cargo from Seattle, no tolls would be charged under this bill, while on the cargo from Victoria or Vancouver tolls would be charged.

Mr. BRISTOW. The language of the treaty is that all nations shall be treated alike. The Canadian vessel can not take a cargo of lumber from Seattle to New York.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not say "Seattle"; I said "Victoria."

Mr. BRISTOW. It can take a cargo from a Canadian port to New York, but that is not the same shipment. It is an entirely different shipment.

Mr. BURTON. It is not the same route, but it involves exactly what such a treaty as this would be calculated to guard against—a disadvantage to one country and an advantage to another.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think that is a very great straining of language in the interest of the foreigner as against the people of our own country. That is the way it seems to me.

Mr. BURTON. In giving treaties an interpretation it is always well for us to be frank and fair. I am willing to take any aspersion that may be involved on that score; for, if anything, we should lean backward when we come to our relations with foreign countries.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire what the Senator thinks of the fortification of the canal as it relates to the language of this treaty. Does he think we leaned over backward when we established the fortifications there?

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Kansas knows that the Senator from Ohio made a motion here to strike out the provision for the fortification of the canal. I do not believe in that; so I am inclined to think the Senator had better call some other witness in regard to the fortification of the canal.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, some weeks ago I stated to the Senate that, in my opinion, the provision of this bill exempting American ships from tolls which were to be imposed upon the ships of other countries—that is to say, exempting ships owned by American citizens from tolls which were to be imposed upon ships owned by the citizens and subjects of other countries—was a violation of this treaty, known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and I said that at a future time I would give my reasons to the Senate.

Since that time the Senate has been advised of a formal communication from the Government of Great Britain, the other party to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, to the Government of the United States, questioning the right of the United States to make that kind of discrimination.

I feel very reluctant to make an argument regarding the rights of the United States under the treaty which have already come into diplomatic discussion. I feel the more reluctant because the view I entertain would require me to argue against the position which the Government of the United States may be bound to take if the opinion of the Senate should agree with the opinion of the House and this provision should be enacted into law.

It appears quite certain to me, sir, that if we enact the provision which is now before us, making the discrimination against which Great Britain protests, as the other party to this international agreement, the question raised will be one for arbitration under our existing treaty with Great Britain. It will present the simplest, most unquestionable case for the submission to an impartial tribunal of the contending claims of the two parties to the contract. We could not refuse to arbitrate the question. Great Britain could not refuse to arbitrate it. It is the kind of question which our treaty of arbitration expressly requires to be arbitrated, and it is a question which ought to be arbitrated.

Instead of arguing the question I shall content myself with suggesting to the Senate that any legislation which may be enacted ought to be framed with a view to the fact that this is a matter about which we can not finally decide. If the judgment of the Senate shall be in favor of the policy of discrimination—and mine is not; I think it is wholly unjustifiable and unnecessary—nevertheless we should exercise our power of legislation with a view to the fact that the question of our right to legislate in such a way as to discriminate is one which may be decided against us by the international tribunal to which we are bound to submit it.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to hand him here one paragraph of that treaty, which is pertinent in connection with what he says? The Senator probably is a little modest about reading it, because of the fact that he made the treaty.

Mr. ROOT. Yes; I made the treaty, but it was a treaty which was really drafted and carried far toward its conclusion by Mr. Hay. It followed the form of a treaty made years before between France and Great Britain, and is the settled form of arbitration treaties, which far outnumber all other kinds of treaties that there are in the world.

Mr. BACON. There are 25 of them, as I understand, that we have with other nations.

Mr. ROOT. We have 25.

Mr. BACON. In the same language.

Mr. ROOT. In the same language.

The article which the Senator from Georgia is good enough to call attention to is as follows:

> Differences which may arise of a legal nature or relating to the interpretation of treaties existing between the two contracting parties, and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, shall be referred to the permanent court of arbitration established at The Hague by the convention of the 29th July, 1899.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I should like to ask the Senator from New York what procedure is available, if any, in the United States to abrogate this provision in the treaty?

Mr. ROOT. Does the Senator mean this provision in the arbitration treaty?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. No; the provision in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which is under discussion—the subject matter of the Senator's present argument.

Mr. ROOT. I know of none. I know of no provision under which this treaty can be abrogated, for it already has been in a great measure executed. I know of no course which we could follow which would not involve us in repudiating the obligations which we have assumed while accepting the benefits for which those obligations were made.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will say to the Senator from New York that my remark was not originated by any present desire to abrogate the treaty. My understanding of the law or regulation in respect to the matter was exactly as he has stated it, but I desired to have an expression from him as to whether or not there was any way by which this treaty could be abrogated in these respects. There has been a good deal of talk in the Senate as to taking steps with a view to the abrogation of this treaty.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, there is a doctrine under which treaties may some time be abrogated, what is called the doctrine of sic stantibus rebus; that is, when in the lapse of time the conditions under which a treaty was made have so completely changed that it is no longer reasonable that its provisions shall be deemed to be binding. The change of conditions may receive effect through an abrogation of the treaty. But no such conditions exist here. By means of making this treaty we secured a release from Great Britain of her copartnership rights in an isthmian canal, and we have proceeded to take what is equivalent to sovereignty over the Canal Zone. We have proceeded to construct, or in a great measure to construct, a canal over which we exercise rights as a sovereign; and without abandoning the canal and abandoning all we have acquired already, which would require the assent both of Great Britain and of Panama, we could not retire from the obligations we have contracted there.

Now, Mr. President, having in view the fact that if we legislate upon this subject we legislate regarding a right which a court to whose judgment we must bow may decide that we have not, though we believe in the policy of this bill, we should frame our legislation with reference to the possibility of such a judgment. We should frame our legislation so as to facilitate such a judgment. We can not do less than that consistently with our oft-repeated declarations in favor of the principle of arbitration and consistently with the requirements of good faith under the treaty.

What would be the situation, sir, if this law were enacted as it now stands and if the question raised between Great Britain and the United States were to be submitted to arbitration and the arbitral tribunal were to decide that the effect of this clause was to put all nations on an equality, including the United States? What would be the effect if the arbitral tribunal were to decide that we are precluded by the terms of the treaty from discriminating between British merchant vessels and American merchant vessels in passing through the canal? That decision, sir, may come one or two or five or ten years hence. Controversies between two great nations are not readily and swiftly disposed of. It is a long and cumbersome proceeding, and with many counsel, declaiming knowledge, perhaps, with long discussions and deliberations; a considerable number of years may be looked to at all events before a conclusion is reached.

If under the law we now pass we have been imposing tolls upon British ships, and French ships, and German ships, and imposing no tolls upon American ships, what must be the judgment if it is against us? Not that we proceed to impose tolls upon American ships. That opportunity will be forever gone; the ships will have passed and will be gone; but that we refund the tolls that have been imposed upon the British and French and German ships, and all the great income of the canal, no one can tell how many millions would have to be taken out of the Treasury of the United States and paid over to these foreign ship owners, if the decision is against us. No one can tell what a vast burden of debt we will be piling up against the Treasury of the United States if we pass this law as it is framed here.

I submit to the Senate that the most careful consideration should be given, not only to the question whether the Senate will commit itself to this construction of the treaty, not only whether the Senate believes in the policy of this proposed legislation, but to framing the legislation in such a way that we may comply with our honorable obligations in seeking and submitting to a decision by an arbitral tribunal upon this disputed construction, and in such a way that if the judgment be against us we may not be subject to ruinous demands upon the Treasury.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator. Evidently this is very important legislation, and the contingencies may be great in many ways. The British Government protests informally, at least, so far as we have it here, against the enactment of this legislation. I assume that in due time the British Government will make more extended representations to our State Department. Congress ought to have the benefit of the views of that Government before we pass upon this matter finally.

After listening to the very able addresses of the Senator from New York and the Senator from Ohio, it occurs to me to inquire of the Senator from New York if he does not think it will be the part of wisdom if we should postpone this particular legislation until the next session of Congress, when we can have in the meantime an opportunity for acquiring greater information respecting it and be prepared to pass upon it with greater deliberation.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, so far as this particular provision goes I think it is very desirable. I am told, however, that a large part of the bill is quite pressing, to enable the officers in charge of the completion of the canal to make the arrangements necessary for opening the canal. Of course, it would not do for us to have the canal finished and be unable to open it. We must have legislation under which the proper disposition and arrangements can be made for the opening of the canal and operating it.

Mr. STONE. When will it be opened?

Mr. ROOT. I understand that the canal will be practically completed during the next year, 1913. The commerce of the world has to adjust itself beforehand to a new facility of that kind; that is, ship owners must know what they are going to expect in order to make their arrangements long beforehand for using the canal. A ship owner does not get up in the morning and casually determine to send a ship by way of Suez or by way of Panama. He makes his arrangements and his contracts for freight, and merchants make their contracts for the purchase and the sale of commodities with reference to the opportunities for transportation. I am told that there is pressing need for legislation along that line.

As to this particular question it may well be deferred. I think it ought to have fuller consideration than we can give to it now in the heat of the summer and with everybody tired and in a condition where he is unwilling to do any work that can be avoided. I do not think that the Senate is in a condition to really give the kind of consideration that this measure ought to have.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator before he takes his seat, of course the Senator recognizes that there can be no decision by a court until there is an issue between parties, and the arbitration court is no exception to that general rule. The question I desire to ask the opinion of the Senator on is whether there is any legislation which we can adopt short of something which takes a position in regard to the matter of tolls on which an issue may be joined which can present to the court something for it to decide.

I ask the Senator if he can think of any legislation that we could enact which would form such an issue or present such an issue as would enable the arbitration court to take jurisdiction of it and decide it? If so, I myself would very much favor legislation which would accomplish that end without a provision such as is embodied in this bill, because, as pointed out by the Senator from New York, for us to adopt a provision in this bill which will let American vessels through this canal free and charge tolls to the vessels of all other nations may involve us in a very large indebtedness upon a judgment by the arbitration court that it was an illegal regulation and in violation of the treaty. Therefore, I think it highly important if we desire to make this issue that, if possible, we frame some legislation upon which an issue can be joined and upon which issue the court of arbitration can pass.

I have not myself given any consideration to it. I should like very much to have the judgment of the Senator from New York, who has had experience in these diplomatic matters and also in the practice before the courts of arbitration at The Hague, whether there is any legislation, or, in the absence of legislation, whether by any other governmental act, we can submit it by a treaty. I do not now recall whether the terms of The Hague convention are sufficiently broad to permit of a suppositious or a fictitious case to be made in the absence of any direct issue, which will make such an issue as will justify the court of arbitration to take jurisdiction of it and pass upon it. If so, I think that is the direction which should be given to it.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I think there is nothing to prevent an immediate reference. The rules which govern nations in submitting questions to arbitration are not technical. That could not be, because different nations of the earth all have different rules, and all that is necessary is that there should be a difference.

Now, that difference may be created by the assertion of a right on the part of one country and the denial of that right on the part of the other, without waiting for the country that asserts the right to exercise it or attempt to exercise it. In other words, the question may be submitted to arbitration just as if a suit were brought for an injunction to restrain a violation of right. I should say that no legislation and no action was necessary beyond an assertion by the Government of the United States of the right to discriminate in tolls.

Mr. BACON. I will suggest to the Senator that sometimes we have had statutes passed which were expressions of public policy aside from the usual prescribing of rules of action and conduct. I think we had one once with regard to the monetary question. Possibly it might be sufficient to engraft upon this bill the assertion of the contention on the part of the United States of a right to so discriminate without in fact proceeding to enact a law making a discrimination.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, following the line of thought suggested by the Senator from Georgia, it has occurred to me that possibly we might make some arrangement for some modus under which the tolls of American vessels could be paid and the ultimate disposition of the amount paid be made to depend upon the decision of the arbitral tribunal, so that if the decision is in favor of the right of the United States to make a discrimination those tolls could go to the shipowners, while if the decision is against us we should keep them, and would not have to refund all of the foreign tolls we had been collecting in the meantime. That merely occurs to me on the spur of the moment. I should like to think about it a little more, and I think we all ought to think about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ROOT. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from New York have any idea with regard to the annual tolls which will probably be received from the foreign shipping through the canal? I ask that question because I believe it to be true that if we have a controversy with Great Britain upon this subject it must eventually be decided in a court of arbitration; but I do not think we ought to be appalled by some vague, imaginary amount that we might be required to refund. I suppose that the measure of damages would be no greater, at any rate, than the restoration of the tolls exacted from foreign shipping. If you will exclude domestic shipping—that is, American shipping—from consideration, I think no one would claim that the probable receipt of tolls in the next five years would be more than $25,000,000. I do not think it would be nearly that much; but even if we were to make a mistake in the interpretation of this treaty and be compelled at the end of five years to restore the money that we had improperly exacted of foreign shipping, it would not be a very serious matter. I think we will find from the estimates as we go along that the amount of tolls that will be exacted from foreign shipping in the next five years will be very much less than $25,000,000, and probably not more than $15,000,000, and if there is no other way to raise the question save by the assertion of our rights in this way, we could well afford to refund the tolls rather than to forego for all time the rights which some people claim the United States has in regard to this matter. As I have said before, I have not made up my mind about it. I am strongly disposed, however, to assert the American right if it can be fairly done from the language and the spirit of the treaty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think the analogy resorted to by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] does not apply in international affairs. It is true that you can not have a decision of a court to settle conflicting rights between individuals until there has been an issue joined, but nations can make up a case, and, by consent, refer it to arbitration. They need not wait until the issue has been made.

As to the point raised by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], that we might lose the point itself, it seems to me that that can be very easily arranged in the bill. You can add in this bill a provision fixing the tolls for the ships of all nations and providing that the coastwise ships of the United States shall go through the canal free, with a proviso that, pending the hearing and settlement of the controversy now going on between Great Britain and the United States to determine our rights to pass the foregoing clause, equal tolls shall be collected from American coastwise vessels, which shall be kept in a separate fund, to be refunded when the decision is made, if it is made in favor of our right to discriminate, and to be kept in case the decision is against us.

I think almost anybody could draw up that clause very easily. It would obviate the trouble suggested by the Senator from New York, and would also obviate the trouble upon the other side suggested by the Senator from Iowa. Meanwhile the two Governments, of course, can easily agree to submit the matter to arbitration as an academic question, as a hypothetical question, simply because one asserts the right and the other denies it. They need not wait for anything further.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I wish to suggest that the proposition originally advanced by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and renewed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] of forming a fund to be returned to the owners of our vessels in case a decision be made in our favor, would scarcely be a commercial arrangement that would be very satisfactory to the country, because the sale of goods and merchandise carried through the canal depends very largely upon the rate of freight that is charged for their transportation. No steamship line, pending such an arrangement, would dare to charge any rate of freight other than such as would be sufficient to pay a profit in case the decision went against us. The result, therefore, of such a fund would be simply to pay to the steamship lines an additional profit over what the ordinary transportation of the freight would bring, for it would be impossible for them to distribute, it seems to me, that freight through all their customers, and their customers in turn redistribute it to their customers so that the ultimate benefit would perhaps go to the purchaser of a yard of cloth in the Andes Mountains.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in answer in a general way to what the Senator from Rhode Island has just said, I will say that, of course, the shippers, as well as the shipowners, would know of the existence of this provision, and they would probably base their contracts upon a rebate to be paid to them finally in case a rebate were made at all.

Mr. LIPPITT. I think, Mr. President, that would form one of the greatest international gambles in which the world has ever indulged.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That may be; and a great deal of business that looks toward some contingency in the future not to be accurately prophesied is a good deal of a gamble. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. ROOT. A considerable part, Mr. President, of the business that is done under our customs tariff involves similar questions. People buy goods when the question of the duty is uncertain, and a great amount of litigation is going on all the time; but they get along with it, and there is an allowance made for it in the prices charged the purchaser.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTRACTS FROM SENATE JOURNAL IN IMPEACHMENT CASES (S. DOC. NO. 876).

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah withhold his motion?

Mr. SMOOT. I withhold the motion.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have in my hand a book which was published by the Senate in 1904, being Extracts from the Journal of the Senate of the United States of America in Cases of Impeachment. This is a very valuable compilation and contains probably all the precedents on the subject that the Senate would care to have. There are but six copies of it left. I ask that it be printed as a Senate document, and that there be included in that document such parts of the Swayne impeachment trial as would be useful and applicable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The order as agreed to was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That extracts from the Journals of the Senate containing the record of impeachment trials in the cases of William Blount, John Pickering, Samuel Chase, James H. Peck, West H. Humphreys, Andrew Johnson, William W. Belknap, and Charles Swayne be printed as a Senate document.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], who was appointed one of the conferees on the part of the Senate on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill (H. R. 24023), has been compelled to leave the city and will be absent during the consideration by the conference committee of that measure. He has requested that the member next in order on the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations be designated to serve in his place. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] be appointed to serve as one of the conferees on the part of the Senate on that bill in place of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

PARCEL POST.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article written by Mr. P. V. De Graw, Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, to the Charlotte Observer, a newspaper published in my State, with reference to the parcel-post proposition now pending before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from North Carolina? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

SENATOR BOURNE'S PARCEL-POST PLAN—VIEWS OF FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL DE GRAW—APPROVED BY TAFT—PROPOSED LAW PROVIDES FOR BUT THREE INSTEAD OF FOUR CLASSIFICATIONS.

The editor of The Observer having requested Hon. P. V. De Graw, Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, to outline from his viewpoint the proposed parcel-post legislation and its probable effect, Mr. De Graw has complied as follows:

While my specialty is that of rural mails, to which branch of the service in connection with the proposed establishment of parcel post my particular energies have been more directly devoted, I will endeavor to comply concisely with your general inquiry.

The parcel-post plan now before the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, known as "the Bourne scheme," has the indorsement of the President and the Postmaster General. In fact, the measure has been compiled by Senator BOURNE after careful personal research into all branches of the postal service. This has been accomplished through a series of conferences with the heads of bureaus of the Post Office Department, who are necessarily experts in their respective lines. I do not hesitate in the circumstances to emphasize what the Postmaster General has already stated, namely, that the department believes parcel post is inevitable, and that being the case no more just and equitable measure than the so-called Bourne scheme can be devised at this time.

The measure divides the country into six zones, determining each by latitude and longitude, and changes qualifications and postage charges. It is believed it will solve in a very simple way what has heretofore been regarded as a most trying and complicated problem.

If the proposed new law is enacted, the classification of mail and postage rates so that instead of four classes, as heretofore, there will be but three classes, is considered a most important feature.

The first and second classes are to remain as now. The first-class mail is to be paid for by stamps attached. The second-class mail is to be paid for in money. Third-class mail would include all mailable matter not embraced in the first two classes. The parcel post already in existence in this country, limited to a 4-pound package, costing 1 cent an ounce to transport, would be changed and the limit raised to 11 pounds.

The cost of transportation will be regulated by distance as well as weight. The country is divided into six zones, the first zone including all territory lying within a mean radial distance of 50 miles from a central point. The sixth zone includes all territory lying outside of a radius of 2,000 miles from the central point. Each State and Territory is divided into units of 30 minutes square.

The rate of transportation was based upon figures showing the actual cost of carrying a pound package of fourth-class matter various distances from 50 to 2,000 miles.

The cost varies from 6 cents for the first pound and 2 cents for each additional pound in the sixth zone.

It has been charged that I did not seem to realize that a parcel-post delivery would be a hard blow to country merchants and would only benefit the department stores of the cities. I do not realize any such thing. Of course there are two sides to every question, which may affect different communities in different ways.

It will undoubtedly be recalled that when it was proposed to establish rural delivery certain sections of the country rose en masse and denounced it in terms most bitter. What was the result? Appreciation in land values by millions of dollars and the bringing of country life, from my viewpoint, far in advance of that of the city dweller.

In order that I may be thoroughly understood I wish to give it as my firm conviction that the establishment of package or parcel post, not to exceed a cost of 15 cents for a package of 11 pounds, 5 cents for the first pound and 1 cent for each additional pound, will greatly benefit the patrons on rural-delivery routes as well as the merchants located in the villages or towns whence rural delivery starts. By way of illustration it may be interesting to cite a personal experience during the past summer.

I was called to Dubuque, Iowa, to address the Commercial Club, a body of bright men, all of whom were opposed to parcel post of any description. Being urged to explain to them the attitude of the Post Office Department on the subject, I instanced the fact that, as they knew, the town of Waterloo lay but 100 miles west of their own city; that in Dubuque 13 or 14 rural-delivery carriers started to the country every morning carrying, perhaps, from 5 to 30 pounds of mail each. Any one of the merchants in Dubuque desiring to send a package to a patron on any of the routes starting from that city would have to confine its weight to 4 pounds and pay 16 cents a pound, or 64 cents on the parcel, a rate which is practically prohibitive. Under the proposed parcel-post or rural-delivery routes, should the Congress follow the recommendation of the department, the rate on the same package would be 15 cents, and, besides that great difference, the weight might be extended to 11 pounds for 15 cents, or 5 cents for the first pound and 1 cent for each additional pound to the limit of weight, an arrangement which it is proposed to confine strictly to bona fide patrons of rural routes and to local city delivery.

After submitting the proposition as I construed it, I queried my audience as to whether in their opinion, under the conditions outlined, any merchants located in Waterloo could compete with those of Dubuque successfully, considering that under present conditions the 4-pound package above referred to would cost 64 cents from Waterloo to Dubuque rural patrons, and a package of 11 pounds $1.76. Under the most favorable circumstances, assuming that the Congress may—and I believe it is only a matter of time until they will have to do so—inaugurate a general system of parcel post by mail, reduce the rate on packages from 16 cents to 12 cents a pound, and raise the weight limit from 4 pounds to 11 pounds, the package of 11 pounds from Waterloo would cost $1.32. Therefore, any way you please to view the matter, the merchant in Dubuque would have so much margin on freight that the merchant 100 miles away could not compete. Every man in the house agreed with me that that argument was conclusive, and that if the Congress should adopt it there would be no opposition to parcel post on rural delivery routes in that community.

Since submitting the argument cited the Post Office Department actually recommended that packages of 11 pounds be carried on rural routes and in cities having city delivery for 5 cents for the first pound and 1 cent for each additional pound, or 15 cents for 11 pounds.

Of course, I can not attempt to predict the action of Congress, but the theory upon which my recommendation for this year has been based leaves me no room for doubt that if the recommendation is followed the parcel post on rural delivery routes will be a great advantage to the persons living in the country, and I sincerely believe will not only hold those who are there, but add greatly to the population in every section of our great and glorious country.

In my judgment, all the arguments which are based upon the assumption that the country merchant by the installation of parcel post would be driven out of business are absolutely without foundation.

As to the inadequacy of present postal facilities to handle the increased business resulting from a rural parcel-post system, which has been suggested, all I can say is that a large and healthy growth of the postal service is considered desirable and that as necessity arises facilities will improve to meet conditions.

P. V. DE GRAW.

Mr. SMOOT. I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 16, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 15, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, O God, our heavenly Father, that back of the vast universe of which we are a part, back of our joys and sorrows, our hopes and aspirations, and all the issues of life, are Thine infinite wisdom, power, and goodness. Yet Thou hast dignified Thy children with the gift of choice and holdest them responsible for their acts. Hence the seeds we sow today will be the harvest of the morrow. Help us, therefore, to sow good seed, that our harvest may be the fruits of joy and peace and righteousness, in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, July 13, 1912, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4913) to enable the Indians allotted lands in severalty within the boundaries of Little River drainage district No. 1, in Pottawatomie County, Okla., to cooperate with the officials of said State in the protection of their lands from overflow, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4948) to amend an act approved May 27, 1908, entitled "An act for the removal of restrictions from part of the lands of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes"; asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. GAMBLE, Mr. CLAPP, and Mr. STONE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 19403) authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. GUGGENHEIM, and Mr. BAILEY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 24565) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PERKINS, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. TILLMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 4913. An act to provide for the payment of drainage assessments on Indian lands in Oklahoma;

S. 7015. An act to provide American registry for the steamer Damara; and

S. 1152. An act granting an increase of pension to Mary Bradford Crowninshield.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 220. Joint resolution to grant American citizenship to Eugene Prince.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 20684. An act providing for the sale of the Lemhi school and agency plant and lands on the former Lemhi Reservation, in the State of Idaho; and

H. R. 17937. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to pay a cash reward for suggestions submitted by employees of certain establishments of the Ordnance Department for improvements or economy in manufacturing processes or plant.

EXEMPTION OF CIGARS FROM TAXATION.

Mr. PETERS, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 25741) amending section 3392 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by section 32 of the act of August 5, 1909, which was read a first and a second time and, with the accompanying report (No. 1000), ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD after to-day's proceedings my statement and remarks in regard to the duty of a person who has given pledges and promises to the people before election and the duty to carry out those preelection promises.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make a similar request for unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] also makes a request for unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

EXCHANGE OF SCHOOL LANDS.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 19344) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange lands for school sections within an Indian, military, national forest, or other reservation, and for other purposes.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects. The bill will be stricken from the calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 20501. An act to authorize the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to exchange the site heretofore acquired for a United States immigration station at Baltimore, Md., for another suitable site, and to pay, if necessary, out of the appropriation heretofore made for said immigration station an additional sum in accomplishing such exchange; or to sell the present site, the money procured from such sale to revert to the appropriation made for said immigration station, and to purchase another site in lieu thereof.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 20347) to authorize the Dixie Power Co. to construct a dam across White River at or near Cotter, Ark., disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. NELSON, Mr. BOURNE, and Mr. MARTIN of Virginia as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4568) granting an increase of pension to Annie R. Schley, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BURNHAM, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. GORE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CONFLICT BETWEEN PLACER AND LODE LOCATORS OF PHOSPHATE LANDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8883) providing for adjustment of conflict between placer and lode locators of phosphate lands.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] objects. The bill will be stricken from the calendar.

DISPOSITION OF SURPLUS AND UNALLOTTED LANDS IN STANDING ROCK INDIAN RESERVATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 109) to authorize the sale and disposition of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, this bill was read on a former occasion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. This bill was read, I say, on a former occasion in the House. It has been on the calendar for a number of unanimous-consent days and has gone over for one reason or another. The last time it went over because I was away. Unless somebody demands the reading of the bill now, I see no reason for taking up the time of the House in reading it, it having been read on a former occasion.

The SPEAKER. As a matter of fact the second time is just the same as the first time as regards the reading of the bill. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] asks unanimous consent to waive the reading of this bill because it has been read once before. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to say that I have had some matters and statements in reference to this bill that came into my possession some time ago, and I have waited four or five weeks, hoping that possibly the gentleman from South Dakota might be able to show that these statements were incorrect. I have had no word to that effect up to this time.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that there was a delegation of Indians who came on to Washington and presented the document to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] refers. They appeared on two different occasions before the Committee on Indian Affairs. The committee, after hearing their protest, reported a substitute, which is now before the House. And I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] that practically every objection made that is at all important has been met in the substitute bill which has been reported; and I will state further that the leading member of the Indian delegation told me that their opposition to the bill was based largely because they had not received any of the proceeds from the sale of a portion of this reservation that was authorized to be disposed of under a former act of Congress. This substitute bill provides that they may be paid $40 per capita from the money in the Treasury to their credit, which is exactly the amount that they are asking.

And I would call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this bill has now been upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar for a number of weeks, and I am sure the gentleman has not had anything subsequent to the protest which was presented before the bill was considered by the committee, and at the time the bill was considered. I want to say that the Committee on Indian Affairs at a full meeting carefully considered the entire matter, and particularly the objections of the Indians, and unanimously reported this substitute bill; and I can say to the gentleman from Illinois and to the House that it is my honest and candid judgment and belief that it ought to pass, from the standpoint of the Indians alone, to say nothing of other conditions; and I believe if the Indians were present here at this time they would withdraw any objection that they made to the passage of the bill in the form in which it passed the Senate.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman state briefly the purpose of the bill?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that the purpose of the bill is to dispose of the unallotted lands in the Standing Rock Reservation.

The original treaty, by which the Standing Rock Reservation was created, provided that the Indians should be allotted a greater area per capita than has ever been allotted to any other tribe of Indians in the country. The heads of families received 640 acres each; the wives 320 acres each; an unmarried Indian, 18 years of age or over, 320 acres; and each child 160 acres. All of the Indians have received their allotments, and there are about two hundred thousand and some odd acres of unallotted land scattered all over the reservation. This bill proposes to sell these unallotted lands and to deposit the proceeds in the Treasury to the credit of the tribe.

Mr. FINLEY. No appropriation will be called for?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Only an appropriation necessary to pay for sections 16 and 36, which go to the State of South Dakota.

Mr. FOSTER. I will state that this bill provides for an appropriation of $180,000.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes; to pay for sections 16 and 36, and that is a question that has been disposed of by Congress on a number of occasions on similar bills, and is simply carrying out the solemn obligation of the United States.

Mr. FINLEY. There being this question of the appropriation of $180,000, why can not this matter go over?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think it has been before the House now so long that it ought to be passed at this session. There is a demand for it on the part of everybody.

Mr. FINLEY. Was this bill introduced in the last Congress?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. My recollection is that it was introduced in the Senate. I am not quite clear that it was, but I think it passed the Senate, but I am not certain.

Mr. FINLEY. What is the value of these lands which are proposed to be sold?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The value is estimated by one of the appraisers who appraised a portion of the reservation heretofore disposed of at not to exceed $2.50 an acre, but this bill provides that all lands taken within the period of three months shall be disposed of at $6 an acre.

Mr. FINLEY. Is not that a very low price for land?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is a very high price for lands of this character, which are semiarid and not desirable for agriculture. They are classified mostly as grazing lands; and I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this bill proposes to dispose of the remainder of the lands after nearly 2,000,000 acres have been allotted. The Indian knows the best land just as well as the white man does. Consequently these lands, you may say, are rejected lands.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I think a bill of this importance where there seems to be some conflict in reference to the matter, ought to come up in the usual way, and not on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, and I therefore object to the consideration of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The bill will be stricken from the calendar. The clerk will report the next bill.

RADIO COMMUNICATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 6412) to regulate radio communication.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, as that bill will be considered under a special rule, I think I will ask unanimous consent that it may go over without prejudice.

Mr. MURRAY. May I inquire of the gentleman to what rule the gentleman refers?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think there will be a rule from the Committee on Rules under which certain bills from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheris will be considered, and this is one of them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Missouri is likely to offer some amendments to this bill when it is presented for consideration.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman those amendments formulated?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman be willing to put them in the RECORD so that Members may know what they are?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would not object to doing that. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place the amendments which I propose to offer to the bill in the RECORD for the information of Members.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Missouri also asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the amendments to the bill for the information of the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following amendments will be offered to Senate bill 6412, "An act to regulate radio communication," by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries:

SECTION 1. Amend section 1, page 1, by striking out the words "receipt or" in line 8.

SEC. 2. Amend section 2, page 3, by inserting, after the word "States" in line 5, the words "or of Porto Rico," and by inserting, after the word "States" in line 6, the words "or Territory," and by inserting, after the word "States" in line 7, "or of Porto Rico."

SEC. 3. Amend section 3 of the bill as follows: Strike out the words, in lines 8 and 9, "Every person so licensed for the operation of any radio apparatus on shore shall be a citizen of the United States"; also, in line 14 insert, after "them," the following: "or who shall fail to enforce obedience thereto by any unlicensed person while serving under his supervision." Also, in lines 15 and 16, substitute for "upon conviction shall" the word "may"; and strike out "and" at the end of line 16. Also, in lines 17 and 18, substitute "for a period to be fixed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor not exceeding one year" for the words "the name shall not be renewed for a period of one year from and after the date of his conviction of any such failure." Also, in line 20, after "charge," insert "or in supervision."

On page 6, in line 14, add at the end of regulation first the following: "Every ship station, except as hereinafter provided, and every coast station open to general public service shall be prepared to use 2 sending wave lengths, 1 of 300 meters and 1 of 600 meters, as required by the international convention in force."

On page 7, line 10, substitute the following for the fifth regulation: "Every station on shipboard shall be prepared to send distress calls on the normal wave length designated by the international convention in force, except the vessels of small tonnage unable to have plants insuring that wave length."

On page 10, lines 13 and 14, strike out the words "at the date of passage of this act."

On page 10, line 17, at end of fifteenth regulation, change the period to a colon and add: "Provided, That the owner or operator of a station of the character mentioned in this regulation shall not be liable for a violation of the requirements of the third or fourth regulations to the penalties of $100 or $25, respectively, provided in this section, unless the person maintaining or operating such station shall have been notified in writing that the said transmitter has been found upon tests conducted by the Government to be so adjusted as to violate the said third and fourth regulations, and opportunity has been given to said owner or operator to adjust said transmitter in conformity with said regulations."

On page 12 strike out lines 23, 24, 25, and on page 13 strike out lines 1 and 2, and insert the following in lieu thereof: "No person or persons engaged in or having knowledge of the operation of any station or stations shall divulge or publish the contents of any messages transmitted or received by such station except to the person or persons to whom the same may be directed or to another station employed to forward such message to its destination, unless legally required so to do by the court of competent jurisdiction. Any person guilty of divulging or publishing any message except as herein provided shall, on conviction thereof, be punishable by a fine of not more than $250 or imprisonment for a period of not exceeding three months, or both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the trial court."

On page 13, line 7, after the word "dollars," insert the words "to be imposed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor."

On page 13, lines 9 and 10, strike out the words "which shall be deemed a misdemeanor."

On page 13, line 16, strike out the words "which shall be deemed a misdemeanor," and in line 17 strike out "may" and insert "shall," and after the word "suspended" add "or revoked."

On page 15, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "or in any district in which the offender may be found."

On page 15, after line 12, insert as a new section:

"SEC. 10. This act shall not apply to the Philippine Islands."

On page 15, line 13, change "Section 10" to "Section 11."

On page 15, line 14, change "90 days" to "4 months."

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ADAMSON, for 10 days, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. KONIG, for one week, on account of sickness.

To Mr. MCGUIRE of Oklahoma, for three weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. HUGHES of Georgia, for three days, on account of illness.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. WHITE, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of James L. Dalzell, H. R. 18775, Sixty-second Congress, second session, an adverse report having been made thereon in the Senate Committee on Pensions.

SALE OF LANDS IN OKLAHOMA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 22647) providing for the sale and entry of certain lands in the State of Oklahoma, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described tracts of land within the State of Oklahoma, to wit, the southeast quarter and the south half of the northeast quarter of section 30, the east half of section 31, and section 32, all in township 19 north of range 13 west of the Indian meridian; and the west half of section 5 and the northeast quarter of section 5, and section 6, all in township 18 north of range 13 west of the Indian meridian; and also any other tract or tracts of land within what was formerly the Cheyenne and Arapaho Indian Reservation which heretofore may have been reserved for agency or school purposes which, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, are no longer needed or necessary for the purpose for which said tract or tracts were originally reserved; and said lands shall be opened to entry and settlement and the proceeds thereof disposed of under the conditions, terms, and provisions prescribed in the act approved June 17, 1910, entitled "An act to open to settlement and entry under the general provisions of the homestead laws of the United States certain lands in the State of Oklahoma, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. I observe by the report that the Secretary of the Interior says that they need these lands if this school is to be continued at this place. Now, this bill provides for selling a certain portion of these lands. Can the gentleman inform the House whether there is still sufficient land left for all the purposes of the Government?

Mr. MORGAN. I think about 800 acres.

Mr. FOSTER. What is being done with the land?

Mr. MORGAN. The Government leases the lands to parties wherever it can.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the object in wanting to sell these lands?

Mr. MORGAN. In the first place, it is the policy of the Government to dispose of surplus lands for homes wherever it can. These lands will be disposed of in 80-acre tracts. It is a drawback to the country, because these lands are not taxable. They should be sold so as to make them taxable. These men who lease these lands do not occupy them to make homes. Their homes are outside the reservation.

Mr. FOSTER. The rental that is received from these lands goes into the National Treasury.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand not; I understand the Secretary of the Interior uses it for the education of the children.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand, if the Government sells this land, it will be necessary to appropriate that much more money for the support of these Indian schools.

Mr. MORGAN. No; as the lands were reserved for the education of the children, the funds will be used for the same purpose. The interest on this fund will be more than the rental amounts to.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the gentleman think that next year there will be an Oklohoma delegation coming here for a larger appropriation for this school as the result of the cutting down of the revenues derived from these lands?

Mr. MORGAN. I can not tell the exact amount of revenue that comes from the 3,000 acres, but there is only a portion of it leased. It is very small. The income would be much greater from the interest on the proceeds than what the Government is getting now. I think the income derived from it now is very little.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the land worth?

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose it would sell for from $10 to $30 an acre.

Mr. FOSTER. Would not the land rent for more than 4 per cent on $10 or $30 an acre?

Mr. MORGAN. It is not all leased; it is in pasturage and not in a high state of cultivation. I could not say how much is in cultivation, but my understanding is that only a small portion of it. At present the Government and the Indians are getting only a limited income from it, a negligible quantity.

Mr. FOSTER. How much are they getting?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, to be frank, I do not know how many acres are in cultivation, and I can not give the gentleman any information. I would not want to mislead him. I am giving an impression. I know in passing around this reservation, just looking over it, I would not think that one-fourth of it was in cultivation.

Mr. FOSTER. This land is increasing in value, is it?

Mr. MORGAN. I would state that this county has been settled for 15 to 18 years. There is a railroad which runs close to these lands. My judgment is that these lands now will sell for practically their full value for land that is not improved. It is a well-settled county, and there is a railroad within a reasonable distance. I think the land would sell for practically all it is worth, or all that it would be worth in a number of years.

Mr. FOSTER. This land is suitable for farming?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not believe it ought to be the policy of the Government, while continuing this Indian school at this point, to sell these lands. Whatever revenue is derived goes to the use of the school. It occurs to me that the Government might just as well keep this tract of land.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not object. I think he ought to take into consideration the fact that as long as these lands are untaxed they are a burden to the white people who support the schools, who support the local government. In other words, in order to make a little money for the Indians and the Government of the United States you are putting an additional tax on the farmers and other taxpayers of that country. I do not think it is good policy for the Government to hold lands for speculation at the expense of the taxpayers, who have a hard enough time to develop and make that new country.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman that if they tax all these 3,800 acres of land at the valuation the gentleman puts upon it I judge that failure to get the money would not impoverish the State of Oklahoma nor make it rich if she received it.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; but in that community there are white children who must be educated. Somebody must pay that money. The National Government does not do that. Those people who live out there in that country have a hard enough time getting along and establishing the elements of society. You are doing an injury by holding these lands from settlement and occupation. You are doing an injury to the white people.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is my judgment that this bill ought to pass and that the amendment of the Committee ought to be disagreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman from South Dakota frankly that if there is any possibility of that the objection will be made immediately.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Just one moment. I think when the gentleman understands the bill he will probably take a different view of it.

Mr. FOSTER. I would state to the gentleman that I notice by the report of the Secretary of the Interior he says:

> The Indian Office has received from the superintendent of the cantonment school a report, from which and from other information in the Indian Office it appears that the lands described have been and are now being used for school and agency purposes. The superintendent says he knows of no reason for selling any part of the reservation at this time unless it should be decided to discontinue the cantonment agency and school.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I took it for granted that there was no longer any use for the lands.

Mr. FOSTER. Are they not continuing the school there?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman from Oklahoma, perhaps, can give us that information.

Mr. MORGAN. They continue the school, but there are 800 acres left for the use of the Indian schools. I would be willing to have this bill amended so as to leave it entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior to open those lands when he thinks they are not any longer needed.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Would he be willing to incorporate an amendment in this bill providing for the discontinuance of this school at this place?

Mr. MORGAN. No, certainly not; because I think the Indians need that school there, but I would be willing to add an amendment to this effect:

> Provided, That these lands should not be disposed of under this law until the Secretary of the Interior shall determine that the same are no longer needed for Indian school or agency purposes.

I would be willing to add an amendment of that kind. Then the matter could go on for one or two or three years, or until the Secretary of the Interior concluded that they were not any longer necessary for that purpose. It would be at his option and discretion. I would be willing to add that amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. This Congress, in the Indian appropriation bill, passed an appropriation for the support of this school, did it not?

Mr. MORGAN. It did.

Mr. FOSTER. And the gentleman from Oklahoma was here advocating the appropriation which the committee allowed for the support of this school.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, it was contained in the general appropriation bill for that purpose.

Mr. FOSTER. And there was no objection upon the gentleman's part to the appropriation of this money for the support of this school and no thought of removing it from that particular place?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; I did not want to do any injustice to the Indians.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the gentleman really think it is an injustice to those Indians at this particular time to sell this particular land now instead of letting the proceeds or whatever money there may be now remain on the chance that in Oklahoma there will be an increase in the value of this land, and in a few years it will be worth much more than it is now?

Mr. MORGAN. I am willing to agree to offer this amendment: That this land shall not be disposed of until the Secretary of the Interior shall determine that it is no longer necessary and can be of no further advantage for Indian school purposes.

Mr. FOSTER. It is my judgment, as long as the Government maintains the school at that particular place, with 243 Indians at this particular time——

Mr. MORGAN. No; only 60.

Mr. FOSTER. I may have read the report wrong.

Mr. MORGAN. I think that only shows there are only 60 pupils.

Mr. FOSTER. I see there are 243 Indians within the jurisdiction of the agency.

Mr. MORGAN. All of which do not attend the school; there are only 60 who attend the school.

Mr. MILLER. May I ask the gentleman this question: Providing this tract of 3,000 acres will be placed upon the market, then how much land remains for the use of the school?

Mr. MORGAN. Eight hundred acres, which is ample.

Mr. MILLER. There are about 3,000 acres to be placed upon the market.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; about 3,000 acres.

Mr. MILLER. And it is contemplated to still reserve 800 acres in the future?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER. Can the gentleman give any idea of the possible use to which this school can put the 800 acres? Would not 160 acres be ample?

Mr. MORGAN. I think 160 acres would be ample, but I did not want to crowd it down too closely.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois, because he is interested in this subject, speaking for one member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who has during the last two or three years been taking some special interest in the schools in the Indian country and the education of the Indian children, I think I can say without hesitation that large land areas in connection with schools are an absolute farce.

I do not believe that the welfare of the school and the welfare of the Indians or the welfare of any department of the Government is served by retaining a large acreage dealing with any school. It is apparent why. We had in contemplation at the time when we set apart these tracts of land the idea of instructing them in agriculture. Now, when you come to instruct 200 or 300 Indians in agriculture extending over an acreage of 3,000 or 4,000 acres, you have lost your idea of intensive farming and instruction in agriculture, and you can only carry it on successfully where the area is probably not more than two sections or a section, or 160 acres even. There is no possible use to which this school could put 800 acres of land, let alone nearly 4,000.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman may be right on the general proposition, so far as educating the Indian is concerned, but it has occurred to me while we are keeping up a school and agency at this particular place we ought not to sell off this land, and it does not cost the National Government to keep this land.

Mr. MILLER. One further thought and that is that I do not agree with the gentleman from Oklahoma that the proceeds should be placed to the credit of this Indian school. Now, why?

It certainly is not good policy to give to any school or collection of schools a source of income independent from the Federal Treasury and from the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman is right on that point.

Mr. MILLER. We should never do that in any case. I think the funds ought to go into the United States Treasury.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman is exactly right. I believe that it is but fair and right that the Government should keep these lands, and if there is any benefit to come on account of the increased price in that great and enterprising State of Oklahoma, and it is likely to come within the next few years, is there not some friend of the National Government here, some time in the history of Congress, who would be willing to see that the National Government's interest be looked after?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I do not believe the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] understands the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN], which obviates all of the argument which the gentleman from Illinois has made against this, and that is to the effect of leaving the matter in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, and that when it becomes desirable to abandon this proposition, then the land shall be sold. I understand that is the amendment, and I do not believe that the gentleman from Illinois understands it.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand it all right.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. It does look to me like 800 acres is a great big tract of land, and it is bigger than we have for colleges for the education of these people.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the gentleman see the possibility in the near future that Congress may be called upon to set apart some land and possibly go down there after this land has been sold and buy it back for the purpose of starting an experimental school where we may teach the Indians how to farm?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. That may be so if there is an increase in the Indian population, but statistics show there is a decrease from year to year.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the gentleman will not make any objection. The proceeds from the sale of this land is to go to the benefit of the Indians. It is to draw interest. The land will probably sell at an average of $20 an acre, and the interest from the sale of these lands will bring as great an income—I think a much greater income—than will come from renting the lands, as they have them now. I do not think the gentleman ought to insist on the white people down there paying an extra tax every year. I do not think the gentleman ought to insist on the white people suffering in order that the Government may enter into the real-estate business and in the course of 10 or 15 years get a little more for this land.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not believe the gentleman believes for one minute the United States Government has mistreated Oklahoma in the matter of these schools. The gentleman knows that each year the National Government is called upon to appropriate out of the Indian funds certain sums of money as advance payment in order to go down there and pay the Indians in Oklahoma. The gentleman will realize that that is some benefit to the people of Oklahoma.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is the Indians' own money.

Mr. FOSTER. That may be true; but if you will take it out of the Treasury continually they will be coming up here after awhile asking that the Government take care of these Indians.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not believe that.

Mr. FOSTER. It may not happen, however, during your time or mine.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I take it the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has examined this report?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I have read it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The Secretary makes this statement in regard to this bill, which is made a part of the report on this:

> Although, as before mentioned, it would appear that the act of June 17, 1910, confers sufficient authority upon the department to open to entry the lands in question when they shall be no longer required, yet if the bill may be amended in such manner as to enable the Secretary to sell the lands and devote the proceeds to a proper purpose when in the future occasion for such action shall fully appear, it would have no objection to its passage as so amended.

Now, that language recommends and proposes the very amendment suggested here and is as follows:

> In order to reach this result I would recommend that the bill be amended by striking out all after the word "purposes," in the thirteenth line on the first page, and inserting in lieu thereof:
> "and which are no longer necessary for school or agency purposes, may be opened to entry and settlement and disposed of in accordance with the provisions of the act approved June 17, 1910, entitled 'An act to open to settlement and entry under the general provisions of the homestead laws of the United States certain lands in the State of Oklahoma, and for other purposes,' or, in his discretion, may be sold by the Secretary of the Interior, under such rules and procedure as he may prescribe, and the proceeds thereof shall be available for expenditure for the benefit of the Cheyenne and Arapaho Indians for their schooling or education, or for the maintenance and improvement of any schools established for them: Provided, That the lands described, or any part thereof, shall not be so disposed of until the Secretary of the Interior, in the exercise of his judgment and discretion, shall determine that said lands are no longer required for school, agency, or other purposes."

That is the language suggested by the department, and with that language in the bill the department would have no objection to it. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there are but a few of these Indians. Of the Arapaho Tribe there are 243, and of the Cheyenne 513. There are 175 children in this school, and I think 800 acres of land for school purposes for a school of 175 children is not necessary, and that if the bill should become a law they would need but a few acres, and even if it was an industrial school you would not need over 100 acres. You would not find that in any State in the Union. Why should it be held back, with no taxes being paid, and preventing the settlement of that country?

Is the gentleman aware of the fact that this country is filled with people who have no homes? Why should we give 175 Indian children 800 acres of land when there are thousands of homeless people all over this country? This is very valuable agricultural land and should be covered with homestead settlers instead of lying idle, as it is now.

Mr. FOSTER. They are renting this land, are they not?

Mr. MORGAN. The Government can not rent the land to any advantage unless a man can take 160 acres and go on the tract. They can only rent it to some man who wants a little surplus land—a man who is living in the surrounding community. Now, if a man could go in there and establish a home and rent this farm he might do that successfully, but you can not manage it successfully otherwise. It is only the man who can go in there and farm this land.

Mr. FOSTER. The Indians are opposed to this, are they not?

Mr. MORGAN. I will say to the gentleman that the Indians originally filed a protest, but they have changed their minds since then.

Mr. FOSTER. There is nothing in the report to indicate that.

Mr. MORGAN. That is true; but the Indians have come here and investigated the matter and are willing now that the land shall be sold.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, I understand the report says with reference to the Secretary of the Interior, that he now has authority to sell this land. Has the gentleman a letter from the Secretary of the Interior in which he says he was mistaken about that?

Mr. FOSTER. Does he state that he has authority to sell the land?

Mr. MANN. He stated that in a letter, and later he stated that he was in error when he made that statement.

Mr. MORGAN. On June 10, 1910, Congress passed an act opening another school reservation, and in that act it was provided that the Secretary of the Interior might sell and dispose of any other surplus land. That act of June 10, 1910, provided that the Secretary of the Interior might sell surplus land, but the act provided that it must be done within six months. Consequently, the Secretary of the Interior could not act upon this, because the six months have elapsed.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] that at one time this was in my district and I am quite familiar with the conditions there. Now, when the tract of 4,000 acres was reserved, land in that country was regarded as valuable only for grazing purposes. It finally developed, in the course of the upbuilding of the country, that it is more valuable for farming purposes than for grazing. Subsequently, in opening the Indian reservations, it has been the policy of the Government and of Congress all along not to reserve a large quantity of the land for school purposes, but only one section or two sections.

Now, take the Pawnee Indian Reservation. On that reservation only one section was reserved for school purposes, where there are nearly 300 children. On the Sac and Fox Indian Reservation one section is reserved, where there are something more than 200 children. So that the policy of the Government has been entirely reversed since the authorities saw their mistake. This land ought to have been sold long since.

Now, here are 4,000 acres of land in a county where they need the taxes from every foot of land that will produce revenue. If the gentleman realizes that one-third or more of all the real estate and land in Oklahoma is nontaxable he can form some conception of the condition that confronts us. That is so by reason of its being Indian land.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest to the gentleman that he does not mean all that. The gentleman did not take into consideration the vast sums of money that the Government is spending in the State of Oklahoma. Does not the State of Oklahoma get some benefit out of all that?

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. What does the gentleman mean by "vast sums of money" spent by the Government in Oklahoma?

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I may say that the gentleman from Oklahoma, who was here during the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, looked particularly after those matters, so that the Government should make ample appropriations down there for all the purposes that could be thought of for the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. The gentleman does not quite understand.

Mr. FOSTER. I suggest to the gentleman that if the vast number of employees of the Government that are kept in Oklahoma are of no benefit to Oklahoma, if their presence there is worth nothing to Oklahoma, why does the gentleman who so ably represents that part of Oklahoma on this floor look after all these matters so carefully, to see that they go into the State of Oklahoma?

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will permit, Oklahoma would be exceedingly glad if every Federal officer was eliminated from the State. There is very little compensation in the few dollars paid to the officers in charge of the local Indian governments when compared with the loss of taxes from one-third of the land in the State which is nontaxable by reason of the fact that it consists of allotted Indian lands. We get a very little, but it would be worth far more to the State of Oklahoma if the Indian business could be eliminated entirely and we could have the benefit of the tax upon the one-third of the State now nontaxable. And I say to the gentleman again that if he withdraws his objection and this bill is permitted to go through it is only in line with the well-established policy of Congress and of the Government recently with respect to the quantity of land set apart for these schools. Not only that, but it would be an advantage in every particular, and there is not one reason known to the people on the ground who are familiar with all the facts why the bill should not pass. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. How large is this school district in which the 800 acres are reserved?

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I understand what the gentleman desires to know. There is nothing in the district that is taxable except personal property. The gentleman realizes what that means.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. For school purposes?

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. For school purposes.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Nothing but personal property?

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Nothing but personal property.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. That is, under the law of Oklahoma.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. And the school district must of necessity be four or five times as large as it ought to be, and the children have to go to school five or six miles, where they ought to have to walk only a mile and a half or two miles.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I think the gentleman does not understand my question. You have a certain school district there. This 800 acres is within that school district. How much more burden is it upon those who pay taxes for school purposes, who send their children to school, by reason of this 800 acres being withdrawn from taxation?

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Four thousand acres.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I thought it was 800 acres.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. He must reserve 800 acres, but 4,000 acres are nontaxable.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Is it an additional burden upon the taxpayers for school purposes within that school district?

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. It is.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. How much?

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. It is very hard to tell, but I should say if this land could be taxed the people would probably be relieved to the extent of 80 per cent.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. If that was all that would be a very important reason why I should favor the bill.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I think the gentleman is quite right about that.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman from Oklahoma will accept the suggestion, if this is all there is as to the merits of the legislation, evidently gentlemen have about all the information necessary to determine whether they are going to give uanimous consent.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I think so.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the unanimous consent will be given.

Mr. FOSTER. I think this bill had better go over for the present.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the gentleman will let the bill go through.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think I am willing this morning to let it pass. I shall object, unless the gentleman wants to let the bill go over.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. FOSTER. I object, if the gentleman does not want to let it go over.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The bill is stricken from the calendar, and the Clerk will call the next bill.

RENOVATED OR ADULTERATED BUTTER.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 24828) to amend the law relative to the manufacture and sale of process or renovated or adulterated butter.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BUTLER. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to pass the bill without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been on the calendar for three or four Mondays. It keeps everybody here who is interested in it, and it seems to me that it should be disposed of to-day. Unless it is disposed of to-day, I shall object.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. As soon as we find and determine upon certain amendments that are objected to and which will go out, and can agree on its going out, and other objections that will be removed, then we will call the bill up.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall always object unless there is a sufficient report made on the bill. There is nothing in the report now to give any information.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request made by the gentleman from Nebraska, that the bill be passed without prejudice?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to state that this bill purports to amend section 4 of the act of August 2, 1886, as amended by the act of May 9, 1902, and it does not do anything of the kind. I hope the gentleman will look up the matter and see what he is trying to amend and have the bill state what it intends to do. It does not amend what is stated in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Nebraska say that there will be a report made on the bill, from which we can learn the purpose of the bill?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. We will give the gentleman from Pennsylvania and all the membership of the House a very full report before it comes up again.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to passing the bill without prejudice? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

FORT NIOBRARA MILITARY RESERVATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 22090) to subject the lands of the former Fort Niobrara Military Reservation and other lands in Nebraska to homestead entry.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that bill be temporarily passed over on the calendar, without prejudice, for a short time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to pass this bill temporarily without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. What does the gentleman mean by "temporarily"?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. So that it may be called up later to-day if we can get ready; otherwise not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PATENT TO ENTRYMEN FOR HOMESTEADS ON RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was S. 5545, an act providing for the issuing of patent to entrymen for homesteads upon reclamation projects.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, to save the reading of the bill, I desire to say that, understanding there will be objection made to the bill in its present form and that there would not be objection, possibly, to the bill in an amended form of a substitute, I ask unanimous consent that the substitute may be read in lieu of the bill.

Mr. RAKER. To that I reserve the right to object.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object to the bill unless we can have an understanding with reference to it. My understanding is that everybody concedes that a portion of the Senate bill is unworkable and impracticable.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will permit me. The Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands has authorized me to offer a substitute for the bill. I assume that all the committee are in favor of it except, possibly, the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the committee have not had under consideration this substitute the gentleman refers to, and have never considered it; and it being a matter of so vast importance, turning over all the legislation for 50 years, I think the committee at least ought to have an opportunity to consider the proposed substitute or amendment.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, this is a Senate bill, proposing to grant patents on irrigation projects. I think no one is opposed to the principles of the bill. Am I right about that?

Mr. RAKER. No; I think the gentleman is not right about it.

Mr. MANN. I had supposed that no one was opposed to the principle of the bill. It is admitted that certain provisions of the Senate bill are not workable, and the suggestion now is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert provisions that have been suggested, so that the matter will go to conference, where the provisions that go into the law can be worked out and made perfectly workable.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In what shape is the substitute to be inserted after the enacting clause?

Mr. MONDELL. It is before the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has it been reported?

Mr. MANN. It has not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is difficult enough to keep track of bills that have been reported from a committee, without being expected to keep track of thirty thousand odd bills introduced into the House.

Mr. MANN. It is not necessary to keep track of bills that have not been reported here. The principle involved in both is the same, and is covered in the Senate bill, which has been on the Unanimous Consent Calendar for some time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me suggest that if the Committee on the Irrigation of Arid Lands would report a bill containing legislation in the shape in which it believes it should be, then Members who have some interest in the legislation might examine it and such a bill might be substituted; but it is not fair to take some bill that no one has ever read and to ask unanimous consent that it be substituted for a Senate bill, not for the purpose of having it enacted into law in the shape in which it passes the House, but of having it perfected in conference, where very few Members ever know what goes on.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the objection that the gentleman makes, and yet the principle in the Senate bill is one that is sought to be enacted into law in every case. The provisions of the Senate bill are intended to provide that on irrigation projects after a certain length of time, and certain work having been done, a patent shall issue, although the Government has not been paid the full cost of the proportionate share of the irrigation project, and that the patent shall be issued to the entryman subject to the lien of the Government. The Senate bill thereupon further provided in reference to enforcing the lien, and provided in a way that nobody on God's green earth could read and tell what it meant.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, if such a bill has been reported by the committee, ought not the matter to go back to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, in order that they may have an opportunity to report and that the matter may go over?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I have no objection. I am not raising any question about that. I asked to have it passed over. I objected to the form of the Senate bill because, in my judgment, if enacted it would not accomplish the purpose for which it was intended, and in place of giving the entryman protection and credit it would not have amounted to anything at all. I have no objection to granting to an entryman a patent after a certain length of time, which secures to him some credit in dealing with other people, subject to the lien of the Government. I take it that the interest of the Government is, first, to permit the entryman to go upon the land, and second, to secure to the Government the proportion of payment due the Government for the construction of the irrigation project.

Mr. RAKER. Has the gentleman considered, in connection with that, other features in regard to this bill that are different from any legislation that has ever been enacted? Has he considered the question of the State taxes, involving the municipal tax, and what shall become of the land if they are not paid? Has he considered the question of the jurisdiction of the circuit and district courts of the United States in regard to foreclosures or the right of redemptioners in regard to this bill? Has he considered the other proposition in regard to creating new officers, practically new land officers, in these 32 land districts, which give that agent the same power as the Commissioner of the General Land Office now has, as well as the register and receiver, and many other important matters in regard to the bill? If the Senate bill did not make those plain and specific, how is the House to know whether or not the substitute is plain and specific when the committee has not had an opportunity to even consider it?

Mr. MANN. I have no criticism of the gentleman if he asks to have the bill go over. I would say to the gentleman that I considered all of those things. I am not on the committee. I considered other things as well which he has not enumerated, because no one could tell from the bill as it passed the Senate what effect it would have. I was not willing that it should pass in that form, but I am quite willing that the gentlemen who are interested have their attention called to it in order that they may prepare a bill which clearly does conserve the rights of the General Government and grants the patent.

Mr. RAKER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the further fact that the bill provides that immediately upon default the title passes that moment into the Government, and then down further in the bill it provides that if the debtor does so-and-so some one else does so-and-so, the title goes back again. So you have the title shifting here like a shuttlecock and no one will be able ever to tell where the title actually is.

Mr. MANN. That is one of the objections to the form of the Senate bill; the gentleman and I both discovered that.

Mr. MONDELL. But it does not apply to the bill proposed to be substituted for the Senate bill, however, I will say to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. I do not believe that a matter of this importance ought to be adopted as a substitute or as an amendment in the House without any consideration by the appropriate committee having jurisdiction of such legislation.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman propose to object to the consideration of the measure.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I want to say, in answer to the gentleman, that the committee have considered and thrashed out the bill and the subject of the various forms of forfeiture and benefits to be obtained by the homestead entryman under these 32 reclamation projects very exhaustively. The whole subject has been gone over very fully, and that is the reason it was put on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to call attention to the fact for the benefit of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands has considered this Senate bill very thoroughly and reported it with certain amendments, some objection having been made to certain provisions by the members of the committee, and most of them informally have agreed to accept the substitute that was prepared by Mr. MONDELL. It is not like the case of a Senate bill coming over here and without any consideration by the committee accepting a substitute offered on the floor of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman's statement shows the necessity of some care in the consideration of this bill. The committee reported a Senate bill with certain proposed amendments and then their attention having been called to certain alleged defects in the bill they had some gentleman prepare what they now call a substitute perfecting the bill, but not in such shape as may be desired by other Members of the House who might be interested in this legislation, and now ask that what they call this perfected substitute be passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The committee has passed the substitute.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But some other Members besides members of the committee are interested in legislation that passes through this House. Some persons other than those representing those desiring to get these lands wish to have an opportunity at least to examine the legislation that is to be enacted into law.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say this in response to what the gentleman from Colorado said——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I had not finished my statement. I will state—what everyone knows—the committee have been having a hard time to secure a quorum lately. For several meetings we have been without a quorum. I do not know whether the gentleman from California has been there all the time or not——

Mr. RAKER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that I have been there every meeting except one meeting, when I was away on important business.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Was the gentleman there last Saturday?

Mr. RAKER. I was.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. You know we did not have a quorum, and if we had we expected this matter to be one of the subjects of consideration, and not being able to get a quorum we have been considering this matter, not only among the members of the committee, but with the author of the bill in the Senate and with gentlemen on the opposite side of the Chamber and with the minority leader also, and the only thing that is in dispute is in the phraseology and modus operandi of the forfeiture. In the substitute we believe it is more intelligible and workable. That is merely a side issue and incidental. That is all there is to it, and it improves the measure, and we feel that this is of great importance to thousands and thousands of homeseekers under these 32 reclamation projects, who are now absolutely held up by the gilis. Some of them will not be able to get title within 20 years. They have no basis of credit by which they can even go to town and buy a sack of flour. By this bill they will be able to get title and the Government will be protected by a lien in full, and it will be of great benefit to all the 15 Western States and all the reclamation projects, and I hope no gentleman will object to the measure.

Mr. RAKER. In regard to that matter I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Colorado to the fact when the national irrigation law was passed it was the intention that each man should have a homestead, that he should not barter or sell it, but that he should have the water right to but 160 acres of land or the farm unit under that reclamation project. Now, the very fundamental principle under which that act passed this act repeals, and permits a disposition of the land.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Not right now, until I get through.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Well, when the gentleman gets through I can get time in my own right, and I will try to return the courtesy.

Mr. RAKER. If it will make any difference I will yield to the gentleman now; this is the first time I have had an opportunity to say a word.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I decline to accept the floor at this time.

Mr. RAKER. Under the Government's lease it might be sold, and anyone owning a dozen other tracts might bid in that tract, that he might mortgage it before the payments had been made, and that would then put it in the hands of an individual holder under the project. Thereby, by this method, instead of reserving the homes, one man under the project might be the owner of all the homes under that project by virtue of this operation of law, and therefore control the dam, control the works and water conditions, and thereby freeze out the other 49 per cent under this project. That will be the result of this bill if carried out.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Could not that be done in regard to private lands, and could not that be done with entrymen who have complied with the law under the present law?

Mr. RAKER. It could not be done under the present law.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. This bill would leave the situation just as it is to-day?

Mr. RAKER. No; for this reason: That you are getting the bounty of the Government to build these reclamation projects, with an understanding that you go there and build your home and you live there; that you will improve the country; and under the policy of this act no man should have any more than 160 acres and the water right, or a lesser unit if directed by the reclamation project. Now, what have we come to? I admit under the general law one man can buy as much land with his money as will enable him to monopolize the community, and this reclamation bill was to prevent that very thing. Now, as it is, before the Government has completed its project, with $9,000,000 invested, we pass a bill by which the Government may foreclose those men; Tom, Dick, and Harry may buy it; and one man may become the owner of 51 per cent of all the land and all the water right under this project, and thereby squeeze out the balance of those homesteaders who went there for the purpose of making their homes. Is that the object and purpose of the reclamation act or the homestead act?

I want to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the further fact——

Mr. MONDELL. I do not believe it will be possible for the House to secure unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill, and I therefore object to its further consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be stricken from the calendar, and the Clerk will report the next one.

PATENTS TO SEMINOLE ALLOTTEES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 23184) directing the Secretary of the Interior to deliver patents to Seminole allottees, and for other purposes.

The bill was read.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DAMS ACROSS DUCK RIVER, TENN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 24197) to authorize Carl J. Kiefer and Laurent Lowenberg to construct two dams across Duck River, in Hickman County, Tenn.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I make an objection to the bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withhold his objection until the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] has an opportunity to be heard. I ask that the bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] asks unanimous consent to pass the bill without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DAM ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER BETWEEN IOWA AND ILLINOIS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 23284) to authorize the Great Northern Development Co. to construct a dam across the Mississippi River from a point in Scott County, Iowa, to a point in Rock Island County, Ill.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I object, in order to save the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] objects, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there are a number of these bills on the calendar, and——

Mr. RAINEY. I expect to object to all of them.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman just permitted one to be passed without prejudice.

Mr. RAINEY. That was because the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] was not present. However, I expect to object to it.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] has already objected to the consideration of it.

DAM ACROSS OSAGE RIVER, MILLER COUNTY, MO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 24067) providing for the construction, erection, maintenance, and operation of a dam across the Osage River, in Miller County, Mo., for the purposes of improving navigation and the development of water power.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

DAM ACROSS CLINCH RIVER, ANDERSON COUNTY, TENN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 23571) authorizing and permitting Clinch River Power Co., its successors and assigns, to build and maintain a dam and a water-power development in and across Clinch River, in Anderson County, State of Tennessee.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] give us the reason why he objects to these local bills?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

DAM ACROSS KOOTENAI RIVER, MONT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 24196) to authorize the construction of a dam across the Kootenai River, in the State of Montana.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is their objection?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

DAMS ACROSS CLINCH AND POWELL RIVERS, ANDERSON COUNTY, TENN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 24028) authorizing and permitting the Tennessee Hydro Electric Co., its successors and assigns, to build and maintain dams and water-power development in and across Clinch and Powell Rivers, in Anderson County, State of Tennessee.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAINEY. I object, because the Government has as yet adopted no fixed policy with reference to water powers in our navigable rivers. All these reports are very meager and insufficient. There is no question about the rapid formation of a water-power trust, and for these reasons and many others I object.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will give me three minutes' time I think I can satisfy him that this is an exceptionally meritorious bill. It proposes to establish a water power where Congress has already authorized a survey for the improvement of the river. It means the improvement of an important river at private expense.

Mr. RAINEY. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] objects.

Mr. AUSTIN. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that he will never get a bill through by unanimous consent as long as I am in Congress if he persists in maintaining this attitude of objecting to purely local bills.

The SPEAKER. All this is out of order. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 22111. An act for the relief of the Delaware Transportation Co., owner of the American steamer Dorothy; and

H. R. 17239. An act to authorize Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution 59.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the action of the Vice President and President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives in signing the enrolled bill (H. R. 23515) entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors," be rescinded; that the Clerk be directed to reenroll said bill; and that in the reenrollment of said bill the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to amend the title of said bill by striking out the word "of" where it first appears in the fourth line thereof and insert in lieu thereof the word "and."

INVESTIGATION OF CERTAIN COAL COMPANIES, TWO HARBORS, MINN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the House resolution 577 to investigate certain coal companies doing business in Two Harbors, Minn.

The resolution was read, as follows:

House resolution 577.

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Corporations be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to make an investigation of the facts touching the handling and selling of coal at the city of Two Harbors, Minn., in accordance with the powers and authority granted to said commissioner by section 6 of an act entitled "An act to establish the Department of Commerce and Labor," approved February 14, 1903, and the acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, to determine whether the said city of Two Harbors was and is prevented from purchasing coal in wholesale quantities by an agreement, understanding, or conspiracy by and between companies, persons, or partnerships engaged in the coal business and in interstate commerce, and to determine whether any of said companies, persons, or partnerships have committed acts in restraint of trade or otherwise contrary to law in connection with the matters herein referred to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] desire to have this bill disposed of?

Mr. MILLER. I desire to have it disposed of favorably and passed by the Congress.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman desire to have it disposed of adversely?

Mr. MILLER. I do not.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman had better ask to have it go over.

Mr. MILLER. I can not see any possible reason why the gentleman should find it necessary to object. I had very nearly completed a brief statement of the facts in this case two weeks ago when the urgency of legislation necessitated the amputation of my remarks. [Laughter.] I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] ought to be willing to let this go through, even if there has not been a complete elucidation of all details.

Mr. MANN. I know what the facts are; I appreciate the difficulties surrounding the case; but it seems to me, I will say to the gentleman, that it goes beyond the intended scope of the Bureau of Corporations, and at this time, with my present information, I shall be constrained to object.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman give me about two minutes to explain it?

Mr. MANN. So far as I am concerned, I have never cut off anybody in my life from opportunity to discuss legislation. I will reserve the right to object.

Mr. MILLER. Without going into a detailed discussion of this measure, I wish to call the gentleman's attention and the attention of the Members of the House to certain striking facts. Of late we have become exercised over the high cost of living, and complaint is heard all over the country. Statesmen and laymen offer many suggestions to relieve the distress. Here is a concrete case. The city of Two Harbors, Minn., consists of about 6,000 people, and three-fourths of the men are laboring men employed on the great docks or on the railroads. It is an industrious, enterprising, progressive city. Its government is under a home-rule charter prepared and adopted by its people in accordance with the laws of the State. The city council, responding to the wishes of the people and zealous to promote the welfare of the citizenship generally, aimed to reduce the high cost of living. In that climate, naturally rigorous during a considerable part of the year, fuel is one of the largest items in the family expenditures. Accordingly the city council took appropriate steps to purchase coal in wholesale quantities and sell to the citizen consumers at prices greatly reduced from the prevailing retail prices.

They advertised for bids, and many companies submitted bids. The bid of one company was accepted, and there was a part performance of the contract under that bid. Thereafter the company said it could not furnish any more coal, and all of the other companies said likewise. Now, that may have been for either one of two reasons, either of which calls for the passage of this resolution. It may be they thought there was not due authority in the city council under its charter to engage in this enterprise. If that is true, the city ought to know it, so that it may adopt such provisions as will give a local community of this character authority to carry on such a work. They have the legal authority under the statute to adopt such provisions as the citizenship of the community may desire. They do not know why the coal companies refused to furnish this coal. No reason was given. The companies simply said deliberately that they would not supply the coal. It may be that these coal companies entered into an unholy alliance or conspiracy by which they each and all agreed that they would not sell any coal to this community for the community to sell at retail to its citizens.

If that is the reason, the city ought to know it, the world ought to know it, and appropriate action ought to be taken by the community and by the Government. I understand one reason urged by the gentleman from Illinois for objecting to this bill is that he thinks it is not proper for the Commissioner of Corporations to investigate this which he, with perhaps a good measure of truth, thinks is a somewhat local affair, but I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it is more than local. It is both local and national. If this is to be passed over in silence and all other acts of a similar kind are likewise to be passed over, then the door is closed to all municipalities that desire to solve the problem of the high cost of living. If a community can not enter into a purchase of commodities in wholesale quantities and sell to its citizens in Two Harbors, Minn., it can not do so in any other place. It is time now to say whether a community's efforts in this direction are to be palsied and brought to naught by a conspiracy among concerns enjoying governmental protection and engaged in interstate business. I for one think that where there is such a splendid opportunity for an investigation as exists here, where all of the companies are large concerns engaged in a distinctly interstate commerce, there should be an investigation by the Commissioner of Corporations and a result secured.

I have in my hand the act establishing the Department of Commerce and Labor, which act I read before I drafted the resolution that is now up for consideration. I should like to read a sentence or two in a paragraph on page 3 of the act, which reads:

The said Commissioner—

shall have power and authority to make, under the direction and control of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, diligent investigation into the organization, conduct, and management of the business of any corporation, joint-stock company, or corporate combination engaged in commerce among the several States and with foreign nations, excepting common carriers subject—

To an act which is specified.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why did they not present this matter to the Federal grand jury?

Mr. MILLER. I can not say why they did not, but I can state a reason why I would not—because the Federal grand jury would not be naturally competent to make an investigation of this character, because they are not equipped as lawyers, and are not equipped with the methods for carrying on an investigation. It seems to me it is distinctly the business of the Commissioner of Corporations to investigate exactly such a subject as this.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The resolution introduced by the gentleman from Minnesota says:

And to determine whether any of said companies, persons, or partnerships have committed acts in restraint of trade or otherwise contrary to law in connection with the matters herein referred to.

I do not think that is a part of the duty devolved upon the Commissioner of Corporations.

Mr. MILLER. I will ask the gentleman from New York if it is not a duty that the Commissioner of Corporations has at least been assuming to perform during the past three or four years? Have we not had report after report coming to this body from the Commissioner of Corporations in which he does exactly such things?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to call attention to the fact that the gentleman ought to put in here a provision that the report shall be submitted to Congress, because under the act creating the Department of Commerce and Labor the gentleman might not get the information that was gathered.

Mr. MILLER. I would have no objection to an amendment making that change; all we want to know is the facts.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I will.

Mr. LINTHICUM. As I understand the gentleman, a number of bids were submitted?

Mr. MILLER. Five or seven.

Mr. LINTHICUM. And one of the bids was accepted?

Mr. MILLER. It was.

Mr. LINTHICUM. And then that company refused to furnish the coal?

Mr. MILLER. It supplied five carloads and then refused to supply any more, and each and all of the companies then said they would not supply any.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Could not these facts be had and this thing be tested under a suit for breach of contract?

Mr. MILLER. I am not certain about that. It would be an unsatisfactory and fragmentary method, it seems to me. This goes into the larger question, whether a community of that kind has the right to enter into that sort of a contract and carry it on, and whether interstate commerce corporations shall obey the law.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I wanted to make the suggestion to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER. It may be that that would be one method of procedure, but this seems to me to be the better and more methodical way. The reason that I selected the Commissioner of Corporations is because he can do it without any expense to the Government. It is work that the commissioner and his associates are already engaged in; they are acquainted with the method and the procedure and know how to go about it. They can do it without expense; it is within their line of work, and it is carrying out the duties which they were originally constituted to perform, and I think the public welfare will be benefited by it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does the gentleman know whether they refused to carry out the contract because they contend that the city charter did not give them the power to make such a contract? Is the Commissioner of Corporations to go into the question whether they did have such a power? I think the gentleman ought to find out all these facts before he comes here with this proposition.

Mr. MILLER. What we desire to know is whether they gave it as a reason for not furnishing the coal that the power was not in the city charter.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Would it not be best first to investigate whether they had the power?

Mr. MILLER. That might be one way, but this appealed to me as being the most direct and the most likely to produce beneficial results.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want the gentleman to understand that I am in favor of the investigation, but I think he first ought to lay the proper foundation for the investigation.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, corporations engaged in interstate traffic here refuse to perform work for which they naturally exist and are constituted under circumstances that imply an illegal combination and conspiracy. I think it is highly desirable that the Commissioner of Corporations should investigate the facts and report. Now, one word more. As I understand the situation just now and the feelings that peculiarly agitate gentlemen on the other side of the aisle, it is desired by them to save this great Nation in many ways. One of the ways is to reduce the high cost of living. They have given us an exhibition of unity and harmony almost unparalleled in one respect. It seems to me that it is now time to give an exhibition of good, conscientious performance of a declared purpose. Here is an opportunity to show whether they desire to do or whether they simply intend to talk. There does not exist anywhere in the country, as far as I know, a place, big or little, where actual performance can be indulged in to better advantage than this to which I have called attention. On the one side a community of laboring people; on the other coal barons. Which side will you take? If flagrant acts like this can go unpunished and unchecked, no wonder the price of coal is raised by the coal barons with a contemptuous glance at the American public. I will say to the gentlemen on that side of the aisle, as well as to the gentleman from Illinois, that I have petitions from hundreds of cities and villages, signed by many thousands of citizens, asking that this investigation should be had by the Government. They are interested in the case, and they know if the investigation is made by the Government it will be authentic, it will be thorough, it will be honest, and when the result is attained the people of the entire country will both know it and accept it. A grand jury up in Lake County, where this city is located, might attempt an investigation, arrive at a result, indict the parties thereto perchance, and the parties be tried, be convicted, but nobody out of the confines of that particular region would know much of anything about it. Of course I am assuming in that statement that somebody is guilty and who lives in that county.

Mr. GARNER. Is the gentleman trying to whip us on this side of the aisle with the hope that the tail of the lash may reach the gentleman from Illinois? [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER. I was talking over to that side, hoping that some of it might reach gentlemen on this side of the aisle in case any of it is needed here.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman says that he was talking to this side of the aisle. Has a gentleman on this side of the aisle said one word against his proposition?

What I want to say is this: Suppose we do go into this investigation and that investigation finds all these facts which the gentleman fears to exist, yet you have not then decided that these men have not the right to insist upon the performance of that contract, because the charter has not been construed by the courts of the gentleman's State. The courts of the gentleman's State should construe the charter and ascertain if they have the power to make a coutract of that kind, and if they have, then go into the investigation, and this side of the House will sustain the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, does not the gentleman think that if that was the reason these companies refused to furnish the coal after they had submitted bids, it is exceedingly strange and remarkable they did not whisper that as the objection when they sent in their refusal to supply the coal?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I rather agree with the gentleman, but I think he should go at it in the right way.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] to the fact that apparently his object is not to secure results so much as it is to advertise either the locality therein or the persons whom he believes to be guilty of crime. No one outside of his own State went so far as to reflect to the extent that the gentleman himself, did upon the mental capacity of the citizens of his State who would constitute the grand jury to whom this matter should be referred. He speaks of a petty, insignificant grand jury, selected from the most desirable citizens from his own State, as lacking in mental caliber to make the character of the investigation needed. If some other gentleman were to make such reflection upon the citizens of his State he would be highly indignant. I presume the House is justified in accepting the gentleman's estimate of the mental caliber of his own constituents and be unwilling to have this matter submitted to a grand jury. But I wish to call his attention to another matter. He speaks about the value of one little demonstration in the interest of bringing about conditions that would reduce the high cost of living. Under the act creating the Bureau of Corporations, the Bureau of Corporations, under the direction of the President and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, has complete authority to make this investigation at this time. The administration is of the political party of which the gentleman is a member. What is the trouble between the gentleman and the administration? If this terrible condition exists, it is not necessary to come to the House and secure the passage of a resolution compelling this investigation. If the facts justify it, the investigation should be made without occupying our attention or compelling us to devote any time to the matter whatever. It seems to me the gentleman should put his own house in order before he attempts to criticize this side of the House. It must be that the conditions are such that they do not appeal to the administration as requiring any such investigation. If they do, somebody must be very derelict in his duty in waiting the action of Congress directing the investigation which the gentleman so eloquently pictures as essential.

In view of the gentleman's statement that the people of this community are so incompetent, so lacking in mental caliber, that the grand juries there are unfit to act as the grand inquest to ascertain in the ordinary processes of our Government whether crimes have been committed, I might be inclined to favor some outside assistance in the matter, but I should not care to live in a community in which it is universally conceded that the mental caliber of its citizens is so low and deficient that the grand-jury system is an absolute failure.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman desires an answer to his question, I shall be very glad to answer it. I shall not attempt a complete answer to all that he has said, but I will state that he undoubtedly in this instance, as at other times, for a purpose congenial to his own soul, has indulged in a sarcastic assumption of facts which he assumed that I gave and which I did not give, and which I never entertained. I take delight in the sarcasm in which the gentleman indulged, but he ought to start on fair premises.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman made the statement in answer to my question that the grand jury in that community did not have the mental caliber to make the investigation.

Mr. MILLER. Oh, the gentleman knows just as well as he knows that he stands there, that I meant that that grand jury, or any other grand jury, is not composed of lawyers or skilled investigators, men who by their training and experience are in a position to take hold of an investigation like this, as compared with men who are in the Bureau of Corporations. I will say further, if the gentleman wants an answer to his remarks, that irrespective of whatever reflection may be cast upon constituencies elsewhere in this Nation, thank God they one and all and wherever found tower head and shoulders above that which the gentleman represents.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, the gentleman knows nothing about them; he has never been there. I will call the gentleman's attention to some facts which will help out. Congress appropriates very large sums of money to enable the Attorney General to pay special assistants and to secure all the technical and skilled aid he requires in conducting these investigations, and if the gentleman were in touch with the department he would have no difficulty in getting these investigations made.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, is not the real reason for this resolution——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MARTIN of Colorado). To which gentleman from Wisconsin does the gentleman yield, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] or the gentleman from Milwaukee?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER].

Mr. BERGER. While I feel highly honored to represent Milwaukee, Milwaukee is not a State.

Mr. MANN. It is in a State.

Mr. BERGER. It is in a State. Is not the real reason for the enactment of this resolution the fact that the real culprits may live outside of the State of Minnesota; that they may live in Chicago or in Pennsylvania or in New York, even? I mean that the grand jury of Lake County, Minn., would not have any jurisdiction, and is not that the real reason for requesting the legislation?

Mr. MILLER. That is the exact reason and one I was going to give to the gentleman from New York when interrupted just now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken as to that. Under the law the Commissioner of Corporations has authority without the passage of any legislation.

Mr. MILLER. I think possibly that is true, but I wish to impress upon the gentleman the fact that the grand jury would not have authority to call witnesses for the purpose of investigation outside of the State, and nearly all the witnesses—practically all—would be outside of the State—some in Pennsylvania, some in Ohio, and some in New York, as far as I know.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Federal grand jury would have ample authority.

Mr. MILLER. The Federal grand jury would have no authority to subpœna witnesses outside of the State of Minnesota. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. GARNER. I want to suggest to my friend from Minnesota——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I promised to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and then I will be pleased to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will permit the gentleman from Minnesota to choose to whom he will yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, just a word with reference to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York that this matter should be left to the grand jury in the State of Minnesota.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I made no such statement.

Mr. LENROOT. I understood that was the statement.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not say that; I had in mind the Federal grand jury, or to have the Commissioner of Corporations, under the power conferred upon him by the organic act, make the investigations without any resolution by Congress. He has that power.

Mr. LENROOT. With reference to the suggestion that it be laid before the Federal grand jury, I want to say to him by the same process of reasoning the gentleman would have opposed any investigation of the Sugar Trust, of the Steel Trust, and of the Money Trust, because it is not a local question in the State of Minnesota. I have a large number——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the Sugar Trust was prosecuted and investigated by the Federal grand jury in the State of New York, and convictions and collections were made through the instrumentality of the district attorney's office there and not through the Bureau of Corporations.

Mr. LENROOT. So the gentleman, then, assumes that, so far as this question is concerned, which after all is a determination of the facts whether there is an illegal combination, submission to a grand jury would not bring any beneficial results, so far as substantial relief is concerned. Now, I want to say it is not a local question involving the city of Two Harbors alone. I have a large number of requests from the State of Wisconsin for the passage of this resolution. I had intended earlier in the session to introduce a resolution providing for a general investigation of the coal situation, but I became satisfied that if this resolution could be adopted, broadened perhaps somewhat, it would give that full investigation that the entire Northwest is demanding, and I want to say to the gentleman from New York, with reference to the suggestion that we should not come before this House and ask for this investigation, that the Committee on Interstate Commerce, controlled by his own party, favorably recommended this to the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is assuming something that is not correct. I offered no objection, but asked the gentleman from Minnesota a simple question and he indulged in such reflections upon the people who composed the grand jury that I replied.

I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to have these people investigated in any manner possible. I asked, first, why the grand jury did not make the investigation, and, second, if it was desirable it be made by the Bureau of Corporations, why the gentleman did not exert his influence with this administration to have the investigation without any recourse to a Democratic House.

Mr. LENROOT. It was the feeling upon my part that the most which could be said for the gentleman's remarks was that he was damning this resolution with very faint praise.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his inquiry.

Mr. GARNER. Are we proceeding under request for unanimous consent; and if so, does not the Speaker think we have gotten about all the information we need concerning this bill, so that the question can be put?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Texas is right on both propositions stated by him, and the Chair would ask whether there is any objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood before coming to the chair that the gentleman stated that right, and the Chair thought it was about time he should exercise it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I still reserve the right to object.

I think it is sometimes unfortunate that I happen to occupy a position known as minority leader in the House, because there are certain functions which I attempt to perform in the House entirely apart from the position of minority leader, and sometimes it is probably embarrassing to my party to have me do some things which I do of my own volition and without regard to leadership. One of those times is unanimous-consent day.

Mr. Speaker, I thoroughly believe, although I may be mistaken, that the State of Minnesota is quite able to handle this question. Here is a town that has trouble about purchasing coal. Thereupon it wants the General Government to investigate, or, at least, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] has introduced a resolution to that effect. Of course, that is all he could do. Active and bright as he is, he has sized up the situation and is endeavoring to pursue the remedy which he can pursue, because he has not control whatever over what the State of Minnesota may do. He is a Representative here, and not there. If the State of Minnesota desires to control these corporations, it has power to do so. It has power to shut them out of the State on terms which it may lay down. I doubt very much if it is the duty of Congress, whenever a local municipality has some local dispute with some one, to pass a resolution directing the Commissioner of Corporations to make an investigation. If this resolution should pass, I doubt not in the course of a year I would be called upon to introduce and urge the passage of not less than 50 resolutions, because if you can have an investigation made at somebody else's expense, you will always have an investigation made, whether one is required or not. Therefore, for the present, I shall object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar.

PATENTS TO ENTRYMEN UPON RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FRENCH. To ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 284, an act (S. 5545) providing for the issuing of patents to entrymen for homesteads upon reclamation projects, for the purpose of giving an opportunity for the objection to be withdrawn in order that I might ask unanimous consent for the bill to be passed without prejudice. I understand those who made the objection are willing to let this course be pursued and have no desire to have it stricken from the calendar. It is for that reason that I make the request on a matter which is of such vital interest to the West.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] asks unanimous consent to return to the bill S. 5545, for the purpose of permitting objection to be withdrawn. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if this is the first time this bill has been placed on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, or if it has been put on there twice?

Mr. HAYDEN. This is the first time it has been put on the calendar.

Mr. MANN. I doubt very much the propriety, when objection is made and a bill is stricken off the calendar at one time, of later in the day asking unanimous consent that it may be passed without prejudice.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, Mr. Speaker, I trust the gentleman will not object under these circumstances.

Mr. MANN. Well, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I objected to the consideration of the bill because I did not believe it was possible to secure its consideration at this time. But I am interested in the bill, as other Members from the West are, and with the understanding that the request will be made that the bill be passed over without prejudice, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] withdraws his objection.

Mr. FRENCH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] asks unanimous consent that the consideration of the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SALE OF CERTAIN LANDS, COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 338) authorizing the sale of certain lands in the Colville Indian Reservation to the town of Okanogan, State of Washington, for public park purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted and conveyed, for public park purposes, to the town of Okanogan, county of Okanogan, State of Washington, a municipal corporation, the following-described lands, or so much thereof as said town may desire, to wit: All that portion of lot 8 of section 17, township 23 north, range 26 east, of the Willamette meridian, containing 47.35 acres.

SEC. 2. That the said conveyance shall be made of the said lands to the said town by the Secretary of the Interior upon the payment by the said town for the said lands, or such portion thereof as it may select, of such sum as may be fixed by the appraisement hereafter to be made under the act entitled "An act to authorize the sale and disposition of surplus or unallotted lands of the diminished Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1906, and patent issued to the said town for the said lands selected, to have and to hold for public park purposes, subject to the existing laws and regulations concerning public parks, and that the grant hereby made shall not include any lands which at the date of the issuance of patent shall be covered by a valid, existing, bona fide right or claim initiated under the laws of the United States: Provided, That there shall be reserved to the United States all oil, coal, and other mineral deposits that may be found in the lands so granted, and all necessary use of the lands for extracting the same: And provided further, That the said town shall not have the right to sell or convey the lands herein granted, or any parts thereof, or to devote the same to any other purpose than as hereinbefore described, and that if the said lands shall not be used as public parks the same, or such parts thereof not so used, shall revert to the United States: And provided further, That the lands conveyed to the town of Okanogan, as authorized herein, shall be subject for a period of 25 years to all the laws of the United States prohibiting the introduction of intoxicants into the Indian country.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I notice that section 1 of this bill, a Senate bill, expressly grants and conveys the land in question. That is always held to constitute a conveyance of the title, without patent. Section 2 contemplates the issuance of a patent by the Secretary of the Interior. I would ask the gentleman from Washington whether he has taken into consideration the fact that the two sections apparently conflict?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, when this bill passed the Senate I presume the gentleman who introduced it there overlooked the fact that this condition existed. We have prepared an amendment to cover it, if the House is willing to accept it.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is on the Union Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire if this is irrigable land?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No. It is land at the edge of the reservation. The town is in a narrow valley on the Okanogan River, and the reservation goes down to the river on one side. As I understand, this land is not irrigable, and the fact that it has never been taken as an allotment is proof of that fact. It is simply a piece of land that lies level enough for park purposes, but, as I understand, it is gravelly and rocky and is not fit for agricultural purposes. It would have been allotted if it were agricultural land. That is certain.

Mr. FOSTER. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the letter of the Secretary of the Interior to the Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs in the Senate, in which he says:

Reports from field officers of the Indian Service indicate that this lot is not actually occupied or used by the Indians of the reservation, but that until the allotment work is nearer completion it is impossible to determine whether it will be needed for allotments. It may be added, however, that a report from Special Allotting Agent Hunt, dated December 7, 1911, indicates that there will not be any considerable amount of desirable agricultural land remaining after allotments are completed. He says that there will be about 2,500 Indians to allot and that as a large part of the reservation is unfit for either agricultural or grazing purposes there will be great difficulty to find a sufficient amount of cultivable land for allotments.

Mr. MANN. Go ahead to the next paragraph.

Mr. FOSTER. The Secretary writes further:

The lot is said to be valueless for agricultural purposes without water to irrigate it, which may be applied by pumping from the Okanogan

River, on which the lot borders. Irrigable land in that locality is valued at from $200 to $300 per acre, and any Indian who may wish to take the lot as his allotment should be permitted to do so.

Now, if this land can be irrigated, as the Secretary says, by pumping from the Okanogan River, and if it is true that irrigated land is worth from $200 to $300 per acre, it seems to me we are giving away the land of these Indians that may be very valuable some time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In answer to that I will say to the gentleman that you can irrigate a rock pile if you have the water. Whether or not it would be expedient to do so would be a question. They could pump water onto this land even if it is rocky and gravelly. I have been told that this land is not good agricultural land. As I understand it, that report was made a couple of years ago?

Mr. FOSTER. This report was made February 23, 1912.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. When was the inspection made, though?

Mr. FOSTER. In May, 1911.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is right.

Mr. FOSTER. What I would like to know is whether this land can be irrigated, as stated by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not doubt that it could be irrigated, but whether it would be profitable to irrigate it I very much doubt.

Mr. FOSTER. If it can be irrigated, as suggested by the Secretary of the Interior, by pumping from this river, and if the land is worth $200 or $300 an acre——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Secretary does not state that, does he?

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me I read it here in the report somewhere.

Mr. MANN. Irrigable land is worth that.

Mr. FOSTER. He says that irrigable land in that locality is worth $200 to $300 an acre, and that any Indian who desires to take this land as his allotment should be permitted to do so.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. You will find further on where they have agreed to this.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know about that. I have not noticed it. It seems to me we ought to have some information on that subject. If that is true, it does not seem to me that we ought to give up this land and take it away from the Indians. The Indian ought to have some right to his property.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there not to be an appraisement?

Mr. MANN. It is provided that the land shall be paid for.

Mr. FOSTER. But paid for in its present condition, which is not worth much.

Mr. MANN. I looked this matter up. I do not speak with any degree of authority, but I was told that this land was valueless for any purpose except a park or an Indian encampment, or something of that sort.

Mr. FOSTER. What does the gentleman think of the statement of the Secretary of the Interior that it could be irrigated in the way suggested? Is it possible to do that?

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is possible to irrigate the land practically.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. MANN. Yes. I do not think it is possible to irrigate it practically.

Mr. FOSTER. I will accept the gentleman's word for it. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have an amendment to section 1.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend, in line 3, after the word "that," by striking out the words "there is hereby granted and conveyed" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to convey."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, strike out lines 17, 18, and 19 and all of line 20 down to the word "further."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to read the language which the amendment proposes to strike out.

The Clerk read as follows:

That there shall be reserved to the United States all oil, coal, and other mineral deposits that may be found in the lands so granted, and all necessary use of the lands for extracting the same: And provided further,

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to authorize the conveyance of land to this town for park purposes. The Senate bill contains a provision reserving to the United States oil, coal, and other mineral deposits. I see no reason for striking that language out of the bill. I do not see why we should not retain any coal, oil, or other mineral deposits in this land, which is intended only for park purposes. If there be any deposits there, they never could be utilized. The town could not dispose of them. The town can only use the land for park purposes. When we grant the title for park purposes, we ought to retain the control of any minerals that are in the land under the surface.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question being taken, the committee amendment was rejected.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. LA FOLLETTE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CONSOLIDATION OF COPYRIGHT ACTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 23568) to amend section 55 of an act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright, approved March 4, 1909.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 55 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 55. That in the case of each entry the person recorded as the claimant of the copyright shall be entitled to a certificate of registration under seal of the copyright office, to contain the name and address of said claimant, the name of the country of which the author of the work is a citizen or subject, and when an alien author domiciled in the United States at the time of said registration, then a statement of that fact, including his place of domicile, the name of the author (when the records of the copyright office shall show the same), the title of the work which is registered for which copyright is claimed, the date of the deposit of the copies of such work, the date of publication if the work has been published, and such marks as to class designation and entry number as shall fully identify the entry. In the case of a book, the certificate shall also state the receipt of the affidavit, as provided by section 16 of this act, and the date of the completion of the printing, or the date of the publication of the book, as stated in the said affidavit. The register of copyrights shall prepare a printed form for the said certificate, to be filled out as above provided for in the case of all registrations made after this act goes into effect, and in the case of all previous registrations so far as the copyright office record books shall show such facts, which certificate, sealed with the seal of the copyright office, shall, upon payment of the prescribed fee, be given to any person making application for the same. Said certificate shall be admitted in any court as prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein. In addition to such certificate the register of copyrights shall furnish, upon request, without additional fee, a receipt for the copies of the work deposited to complete the registration."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I can not, from an examination made somewhat casually of the bill, see any objection to its passage; but I notice in the report where it states what the bill does I find that it is not quite correctly stated. I would like to inquire of the gentleman if he will state what the bill does do. Can the gentleman tell what new language, new as to the existing law, is inserted in the bill?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes; beginning at line 1, page 2, I will read the new part:

Name of the country of which the author of the work is a citizen or subject, and when an alien author domiciled in the United States at the time of said registration, then a statement of that fact, including his place of domicile, the name of the author (when the records of the copyright office shall show the same), the title of the work which is registered for which copyright is claimed, the date of the deposit of the copies of such work, the date of publication if the work has been published.

Mr. MANN. Is not that now in the existing law?

Mr. OLDFIELD. No; it is not. This is merely to make the certificate of the copyright state the facts essential for one to know without going to the copyright office to get the facts.

Mr. MANN. The language the gentleman read is not included in the report as made.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I intended that it should be.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, strike out the word "published" and insert the words "reproduced in copies for sale or publicly distributed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 17, after the word "out," insert the words "in each case."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

PENSION TO WIDOWS AND MINOR CHILDREN OF SPANISH AND PHILIPPINE INSURRECTION SOLDIERS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 17470) to pension widow and minor children of any officer or enlisted man who served in the War with Spain or Philippine insurrection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act if any officer or enlisted man who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States, either as a regular or volunteer, during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, has died or shall hereafter die leaving a widow or minor children under the age of 16 years, such widow shall, upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his Army or Navy service, be placed on the pension roll from the date of the filing of her application therefor under this act, at the rate of $12 per month during her widowhood, and shall also be paid $2 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under 16 years of age, and in the case of the death or remarriage of the widow, leaving a child or children of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16: Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of said child, or during the period of such disability, and shall commence from the date of application therefor after the passage of this act: Provided further, That said widow shall not have married said officer or enlisted man after he shall have passed the age of 50 years: And provided further, That the beneficiaries under this act shall include the widows and orphans of acting assistant surgeons, contract doctors, dentists, veterinary surgeons, and officers and enlisted men in the United States Revenue-Cutter Service on vessels temporarily under the control of the War or Navy Departments: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private.

SEC. 2. That no agent, attorney, or other person engaged in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any claim under the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain for such services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting such claim a sum greater than $10, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions, by the pension agent making payment of the pension allowed; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension or claim allowed or due such pensioner or claimant under this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have a statement in relation to the bill by the gentleman in charge of it. I have not finished reading the report, and I want to know the reason for the legislation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The purpose of the legislation is, as the gentleman will see from the report, to equalize the widows of the Spanish soldiers with widows of the Civil War, Mexican War, and Indians wars. The purpose of this bill is to place the widows of the Spanish War with the widows in all other wars that our Government took part in.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is not this more liberal legislation and more prompt than was accorded to the widows of the soldiers of the Civil War?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is not any more liberal, but it does give them the benefit of the pension a little bit earlier.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How much earlier?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Perhaps 12 or 15 years earlier than was accorded to the widows of the Civil War.

1. I am informed by the Commissioner of Pensions that in the consideration of claims filed on account of service during the War with Spain and the Philippine insurrection, April 21, 1898, has been accepted as the date of commencement of the War with Spain, and July 4, 1902, as the date of termination of the Philippine insurrection.

2. In a publication issued some years ago it was estimated that the number of United States troops engaged in the Spanish War was 312,523, and that the number engaged in the Philippine insurrection was 140,038. No data, however, is obtainable showing the number of individuals engaged in the two services, as this department has no definite information as to the number of persons who were in the service during the Spanish War who reenlisted and were in the service during the Philippine insurrection.

3. The number of claims filed by widows and dependents based upon service during the Spanish War and the Philippine insurrection is 14,614; and the number of widows and dependents who have been granted pensions on account of such service, 7,122. The number of widows on the roll on account of the service above named, on June 30, 1911, was 1,217 and the number of minor children 326. The number of widows' claims which have been rejected is 4,705. In the number rejected there are no doubt included many claims which have been rejected the second or third time, upon the submission of additional evidence; so that the actual number of rejections would be somewhat less than that given.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Has the gentleman had an estimate made of how much the annual charge on the Treasury will be as a consequence of this legislation?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; it was made because of an application by letter to the Secretary of the Interior Department on my own part. It has been made as accurately and as near as it could be made by application to the Superintendent of Pensions in the Interior Department. An elaborate letter was written upon the subject and careful estimates were made. They are not accurate as a matter of course. The number of widows of Spanish-American soldiers that had already been pensioned were taken into the account. I think it about as accurate as can be made under existing circumstances. No estimate of such expenses can be ascertained accurately.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What was that estimate, approximately?

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman will read the report on page 3 he will find that the matter is fully set forth; just what was said to the committee and to myself as chairman.

Mr. AUSTIN. It is in paragraph 4.

Mr. RICHARDSON. For full information, I refer to that part of the Secretary's letter that gives information on this subject.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have just seen it. Mr. Speaker, I see that it is estimated that it will cost about $2,500,000 a year.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But the gentleman does not mean to say that the first year it will cost that. It may cost more. I can not make any more accurate statement than is included in that report. It is impossible. I think the report sets forth the facts upholding the merits of the case.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I regret to have to admit, Mr. Speaker, that I have not read the report. I did not know that there was any such bill on the calendar. My impression is that this Government has gone about as far and been about as liberal in the matter of pensions as it ought to go. I have been a Member of this House for about 15 years, and I have seen this legislation go almost unopposed, and I dare say that it is utterly futile to make an effort to prevent the enactment of legislation that has organized voters behind it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think that is properly said in this case at all. As for myself, no "organization" from the South or from my own State or my own home has used any influence to control me in this matter.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object to the gentleman's statement in that respect.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I have to differ with the gentleman from Colorado, but I repeat that in my judgment there are organizations of voters behind this measure. Since it was called up I remember myself having received communications from camps of Spanish War veterans in Colorado urging this legislation.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I am not surprised at that at all, because we are very much interested in this legislation.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] that of course there are some organizations behind this bill. That must always be the case.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That has been denied and objected to.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I am speaking as a man who voted against the Sherwood pension bill and who holds the views of the gentleman from Texas with regard to that measure. I do not, however, think that this particular bill comes into the same class. I voted against the Sherwood bill, and everybody knows that I come from a part of the country which is full of Union soldiers. Yet I say that this particular bill seems to me to be perfectly just and very proper legislation. There are organizations behind it to a certain extent. There are some organizations of Spanish War veterans who have petitioned for it. In my district no organization of Spanish War veterans, with the exception of a single one, has so much as called my attention to the existence of the bill. One organization in a very informal way, through some of its members, brought this question to my notice without in the least demanding my support for it. I appeal to the gentleman from Texas, with whom I agreed in the matter of the Sherwood and Sulloway bills, to reopen his mind and see whether this bill is subject to the same criticisms which might be made in the case of those measures.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I can add to what the gentleman from Massachusetts has said. I have not received the scratch of a pen from any one organization of the Spanish War soldiers in the South or in my own State or district. I would not blame them at all for being interested in having their widows provided for.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I wish to know if the gentleman thinks it is a tenable objection to the merits of a bill that some organization, though it be composed of soldiers of the Civil or Spanish-American War, or any other war, have asked for the enactment of the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. As for myself, I think the soldiers of the Spanish-American War or their widows have the right to apply in behalf of their interests to me or any other member of the Pension Committee. All other interests are tolerated in the same way.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I voted for the Sherwood bill and for the Sulloway bill, and I am proud that it was in conformity to the recommendations of my constituency. Whom do we represent upon the floor of the American Congress but the people, and who are these soldiers but the people? [Applause.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, what has been said absolutely bears out the accuracy of my statement that there were organizations of voters behind this legislation. Now, of course, these people have the right under the law, at least it is not forbidden, to organize for any kind of a measure they please, but it occurs to me that the laws we now have with reference to pensions are abundantly liberal. The Spanish-American War was not a great war. A large number of our troops took the hazard of watermelons in Georgia and Florida, fought the malaria and mosquitoes, but very few Spaniards. I do not know how true it is, but I was told some time ago that within less than four years after the Spanish-American War an enormous percentage, very much more than a majority, of the regimental organization of volunteers had applied for pensions, 80 per cent, I think it was, in one regiment, on account of their health having been ruined by the struggles and hardships of that war. Now it appears, from a hasty reading of this report and from the communication from the Secretary of the Interior to the gentleman from Alabama, that the number of claims filed by widows and dependents, based upon service during the Spanish War and the Philippine insurrection, is 14,614. That letter was written June 1 of this year, and the number of widows and dependents who have been granted pensions on account of such service was 7,122.

The number of widows' claims that have been rejected is 4,705. Now, I presume that it was found the claims of those widows were not covered by the law, and as the Treasury could stand an invasion or two it was thought proper to enact legislation that would throw wide the doors and give access to it of those whose claims had been rejected as being undeserving. The Spanish-American War yielded comparatively little in heroics, but paid the most marvelous dividends in politics and in magazine articles of any war in the history of this country. The greatest evil of that war was not from the actual shock of battle but from the consequences of it. It has led us into all kinds of adventures of a political nature in which it is not helpful or profitable for this country to be engaged. It has created and foisted upon the public a type of hero who does not commend himself to me because of his patriotism, his love of his country, or his great skill in military matters. I do not believe that the bill should pass. I believe we could well afford to stop, and I believe that in spite of these organizations a great majority of the people of this country would sustain us if we did for a long time no more than has already been done in the way of granting pensions. But I recognize the utter futility of the effort. I realize from the applause that greeted the remarks of my friend from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] that the pension propaganda is still popular.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised that the gentleman from Texas should urge as a reason that this bill should not pass that there are organizations of voters behind it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects to the present consideration of this bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice. Mr. CRAGO is very much interested in it, and I reluctantly took this case up during his absence, and I should be very glad if the House would pass over the bill without prejudice.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I supplement the request made by the gentleman. My colleague is unavoidably absent, and I know it would be a favor to him if this could go over without prejudice for two weeks.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Texas will withdraw his objection and let the gentleman make his request——

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am willing to have that done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I want to object to the request of the gentleman from Alabama. He puts it upon the ground of the absence of Mr. CRAGO——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did that because he is the author of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas withdraws his objection and the gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any more ripe time, even though my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] is not here——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I renew my objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas renews his objection to the present consideration of this bill.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Then when does it come up again?

The SPEAKER. It goes off of this calendar and can be put back on it once more and come up two weeks from to-day, if we ever reach it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. As I understand, if the objection of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] is withdrawn, it comes up on the next Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Here is the situation. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] objects. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] asks him to withdraw his objection in order that he might ask that this bill be passed without prejudice, and the gentleman from Texas withdraws his objection. The gentleman from Alabama made his request, and then the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] made some remarks, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] objected again. Then he withdrew his objection on the condition that you get it postponed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I certainly did, and I have not——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] withdraw it for that purpose?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection under protest.

The SPEAKER. It does not make any difference how you withdraw it, so that you withdraw it. There is no objection, and the bill is passed without prejudice. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the Chair's attention to a Senate pension bill and a request for a conference. The Clerk has the bill there and will read it, if necessary.

The SPEAKER. After we get through with the Unanimous Consent Calendar the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I thought that, being on my feet, I could get unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. We can not interfere with the Unanimous Consent Calendar. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ASSIGNMENT OF DESERT-LAND ENTRIES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 5446) relating to partial assignment of desert-land entries within reclamation projects made since March 28, 1908.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a desert-land entry within the exterior limits of a Government reclamation project may be assigned in whole or in part under the act of March 28, 1908 (35 Stat. L., 52), and the benefits and limitations of the act of June 27, 1906 (34 Stat. L., 520), shall apply to such desert-land entryman and his assignees: Provided, That all such assignments shall conform to and be in accordance with farm units to be established by the Secretary of the Interior upon the application of the desert-land entryman. All such assignments heretofore made in good faith may be recognized under this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask a question in regard to the bill, which appears to be a meritorious one, and ask what is meant by the words:

All such assignments heretofore made in good faith may be recognized under this act?

Mr. RAKER. The object and purpose is that there are some of these assignments that have been made by the original entrymen, and the departments have held they were not valid under the act as it existed. They have investigated, though, and find those which they have investigated were in good faith and they believe the balance are in good faith, and the departments ask this legislation that they may investigate assignments already made, and, if right, the assignee will get his title clear, and the whole entry will stand as originally filed, without going back to the Government and making a new fight.

Mr. MANN. Now, here are some claims. We pass a law. Then it says:

All such assignments heretofore made in good faith may be recognized under this act.

Does it mean they may be recognized under this act? Somebody must decide, and, if so, who?

Mr. RAKER. The Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. It does not say so here.

Mr. RAKER. Those matters are up to the office, coming from the Department of the Interior. They are sent through the local land office to the department. After investigation he determines whether they shall be recognized, and, if in good faith, of course he has the discretion to recognize them. It was not intended to make it compulsory on him to recognize them, but we wanted to give him full opportunity for full investigation. That is the object.

Mr. MANN. He would still have all that provided the assignments were made in good faith. I am aware that this language is language prepared by the Department of the Interior. I do not know that I shall live long enough, and, doubtless, if I do, I shall not be in Congress long enough for the Interior Department to find some one who is capable of drawing bills and put that person on that job.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. It is to be hoped so.

Mr. MANN. I am saying this for the benefit of the Secretary of the Interior, who, by the way, has failed in recent months to sign communications to Congress. Every communication we receive from the office of the Secretary of the Interior, or almost every one, is signed by the First Assistant Secretary. The Department of the Interior is the only department of the Government that deliberately permits the head of the office or department in communicating to Congress to escape the responsibility and put that responsibility upon a subordinate. I am saying this, I say, for the benefit of the Secretary, who is my warm personal friend, and in the hope that, so long as he occupies the position of head of the department, he will have somebody do the work and then be willing to accept the responsibility of communicating the result of that work to Congress. I do not blame him for not accepting the responsibility for these various bills, the drafts of which they send to us, because I am very sure I would not want to accept the responsibility myself. There ought to be somebody there, however, who is capable of drawing bills and who will draw bills and let the Secretary communicate them to Congress when asked by committees to do so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and I have been convinced that it is not just to the Secretary of the Interior, or to anybody connected with the department, to have a further discretion if, on investigation, it is found that the assignments have been made in good faith. I think the gentleman from California ought to amend his bill and strike out the word "may" and say "shall." Otherwise in a great department it is a premium on blackmail, it seems to me. That is to say, attorneys, claim agents, and perhaps unworthy people connected with the land service, if such there be, although I trust there are not, would thereby find an opportunity to obtain an undue advantage. "Lead us not into temptation" is, I think, the strongest petition in the Lord's Prayer. I trust the gentleman from California will agree to strike out the word "may" and put in "shall."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, personally that would appeal very much to me and, I am satisfied, to the House; but it seems as though in deference to the great Department of the Interior, after they have made their examination, they should have some discretion.

Mr. CANNON. Well, after all, there is a discretion in determining whether it is in good faith. That ought to end it, if they find it is in good faith. I have a high respect for all the departments, and then I have some respect for myself.

Mr. RAKER. If it will expedite the passage of this bill I will ask to have the word "may" changed to "shall."

Mr. CANNON. I confess it will.

Mr. RAKER. Then I will guarantee that I will make the motion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Did the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] offer an amendment?

Mr. CANNON. No. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] gave notice that he would offer an amendment.

Mr. RAKER. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the word "may," in line 4, page 2, be stricken out and the word "shall" substituted therefor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, by striking out, in line 4, the word "may" and insert in lieu thereof the word "shall."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the amended Senate bill.

The Senate bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAKER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONSOLIDATION OF LANDS IN PAULINA NATIONAL FOREST, OREG.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 4745) to consolidate certain forest lands in the Paulina (Oreg.) National Forest.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior, for the purpose of consolidating the forest lands belonging to the United States within the Paulina (Oreg.) National Forest, be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture, to exchange lands belonging to the United States which are part of the Paulina (Oreg.) National Forest for privately owned lands lying within the exterior limits of the said national forest: Provided, That the lands so exchanged shall be equal in area and substantially equal in value: And provided further, That upon the consummation of such exchange the land deeded to the United States thereunder shall become a part of the Paulina (Oreg.) National Forest.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman to make a brief statement in regard to the bill. Will the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] state just what this bill accomplishes? I have seen the Senate report, I think, but the House report has not yet been printed.

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill proposes to exchange some privately owned lands in the Paulina National Forest for some lands now owned by the Government in equal areas. Many years ago, before the forest reservation was created, the Government made a land grant through this section of the country, and when the forest was created, of course, the privately owned lands did not become a part of the national forest, although included within its exterior boundaries.

In the southern portion of this section of the country, where the lands lie which are proposed to be exchanged, there is a light soil, known in that country as a "pummy" soil, which does not produce timber. A small scrub pine tree will grow there, a few feet in height, but of no value; but on the higher portions of the tract yellow pine grows of a very excellent quality and considerable size. The company which owns certain sections through this national forest desire to exchange their pine lands in the north for the comparatively level "pummy" lands in the south, and they desire to irrigate these lands. Under the water law of Oregon they had until a certain time, some time in the spring of this year, to make certain improvements; but while this bill was pending the State engineer of Oregon gave them an extension of time until the end of this Congress to see whether Congress would authorize the exchange or not. If the bill is passed, then they will irrigate only the lower portion and consolidate their lands. If not, they will have to irrigate the alternate sections all through the tract.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, this bill has been before the Committee on the Public Lands for quite a while. Is the report upon it a unanimous one?

Mr. HAWLEY. I know of no objection to it.

Mr. RAKER. I will state in this connection that the Committee on the Public Lands made a very thorough investigation and a full report upon the matter, and heard the Department of Agriculture and the Forest Service, and went into the matter very carefully, and had public hearings. A full and complete report has been made by the committee.

Mr. MANN. Which report has not yet been printed.

Mr. RAKER. I want to call the attention of the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. I wanted to know whether it was a unanimous report.

Mr. RAKER. It was a unanimous report, and a proof of it was sent to me to correct. I sent it back the day after it was sent to me, and since I found this morning that it was not here I have been using every effort to get it.

Mr. MANN. I can tell the gentleman why he has not got it.

Mr. RAKER. I think I understand the reason why.

Mr. MANN. There were some plates put into it, and they had to send the plates out to be prepared.

Mr. HAWLEY. The report of the committee is unanimous.

Mr. MANN. I sent over and got the Senate report, and got the information which I have in that way.

Mr. RAKER. The committee believe it is a just and proper bill and that it ought to pass.

Mr. MANN. The department is in favor of it?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAKER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

WATER SUPPLY OF COLORADO SPRINGS AND MANITOU, COLO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 23293) for the protection of the water supply of the city of Colorado Springs and the town of Manitou, Colo.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the public lands within the Pike National Forest, situated in the counties of El Paso and Teller, Colo., hereinafter described, are hereby reserved from all forms of location or entry and set aside as a municipal water-supply reserve for the benefit of the city of Colorado Springs, a municipal corporation of the State of Colorado, to wit:

Lot 3, the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter and the south half of the southeast quarter of section 7; the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 8; the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter, the south half of the southwest quarter, the west half of the southeast quarter, and the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 17; lots 2, 3, and 4, the northeast quarter, the east half of the northwest quarter, the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter, and the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 18; lots 2, 3, and 4, the northeast quarter, the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter, the east half of the southwest quarter, and the west half of the southeast quarter of section 19; the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 20; lots 1, 2, 3, and 4, the west half of the northeast quarter, the east half of the northwest quarter, and the east half of the southwest quarter of section 30; lot 1, the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter and the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 31, in township 13 south, range 68 west of the sixth principal meridian.

Lot 6 of section 4; lots 1, 2, 3, and 4, the south half of the northeast quarter, and the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 9; the south half of the northeast quarter, the south half of the northwest quarter, the southwest quarter, and the north half of the southeast quarter of section 10; the south half of the southeast quarter, and the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 14; the north half of the northwest quarter, and the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 15; lot 2, the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter, the south half of the southeast quarter, and the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 22; the east half of the northeast quarter, the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter, the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter, and the south half of section 23; the north half of the north half, the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter, the southwest quarter, the west half of the southeast quarter, and the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 26; the north half of the northeast quarter, the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter, and the south half of section 27, in township 14 south, range 68 west of the sixth principal meridian.

The southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 10; the south half of the northeast quarter, the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter, the east half of the southwest quarter, and the southeast quarter of section 13; the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter, and the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 14; the west half of the northeast quarter, and the north half of the southwest quarter of section 15; the west half of the northeast quarter, the west half of the southeast quarter, the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter, and the south half of the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 21; the northeast quarter, the east half of the northwest quarter, the east half of the southwest quarter, the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter, the south half of the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter, and the southeast quarter of section 22; all of sections 23 and 24; the northeast quarter, the east half of the northwest quarter, and the south half of section 25; the west half of the northeast quarter, the northwest quarter, and the south half of section 26; all of section 27; the north half of the northeast quarter, the west half and the south half of the southeast quarter of section 35; the north half of the northeast quarter, and the west half of section 36, in township 13 south, range 69 west of the sixth principal meridian.

The west half (or lots 3 and 4, the south half of the northwest quarter, and the southwest quarter) of section 1; and the north half of the northeast quarter (or lots 1 and 2) of section 2, in township 14 south, range 69 west of the sixth principal meridian, containing 10,131.23 acres, more or less.

SEC. 2. That the public lands within the Pike National Forest, situated in the counties of El Paso and Teller, Colo., hereinafter described, are hereby reserved from all forms of location or entry and set aside as a municipal water-supply reserve for the benefit of the town of Manitou, a municipal corporation of the State of Colorado:

Lot 4, the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter, and the south half of the southeast quarter of section 31; the south half of the southwest quarter, the south half of the southeast quarter, and the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 32; the south half of the northeast quarter, the north half of the southwest quarter, and the east half of the southeast quarter of section 33; all of section 34; the west half of section 35, in township 13 south, range 68 west of the sixth principal meridian.

Lots 3 and 4, the south half of the northwest quarter, the north half of the southwest quarter, and the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 2; all (including lots 1, 2, 3, and 4) of section 3; lot 5, the north half (including lots 1, 2, 3, and 4), and the east half of the southeast quarter of section 4; lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, the south half of the northeast quarter, the south half of the northwest quarter, and the north half of the southwest quarter of section 5; lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, the south half of the northeast quarter, the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter, the east half of the southwest quarter, the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter, and the north half of the southeast quarter of section 6; lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 of section 7; the north half of the northeast quarter of section 10, in township 14 south, range 68 west of the sixth principal meridian.

The east half (or lots 1 and 2, the south half of the northeast quarter, and the southeast quarter) of section 1; and all that part of the northeast quarter of section 12 lying north of the north line of the Pikes Peak Military Reservation, in township 14 south, range 69 west of the sixth principal meridian, containing 4,712 acres, more or less.

SEC. 3. That the lands heretofore described and reserved for municipal water-supply purposes shall be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture in cooperation with the city of Colorado Springs and the town of Manitou for the purpose of storing and conserving the water supply, protecting them from pollution, and preserving the timber on said lands to more fully accomplish such purposes, and to that end said city and town shall each have the right, subject to approval by the Secretary of Agriculture, to the use of any and all parts of the lands reserved for them, respectively, for the storage and conveying of water, and the construction and maintenance thereon of reservoirs, pipes, mains, conduits, and other like improvements.

SEC. 4. That in addition to the authority given the Secretary of Agriculture under the act of June 4, 1897 (30 Stats., p. 35), he is hereby authorized to prescribe and enforce such regulations as he may find necessary to carry out the purpose of this act, including the right to forbid persons other than forest officers and those authorized by the municipal authorities from entering or otherwise trespassing upon these lands, and any violation of this act or of regulations issued thereunder shall be punishable as is provided for in the act of June 4, 1888, amending section 5388 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

SEC. 5. That this act shall be subject to all legal rights heretofore acquired by any person or persons in or to the above-described premises, or any part thereof, and now existing under and by virtue of the laws of the United States or of the State of Colorado.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I understand this proposes to grant certain land for water-supply purposes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The lands in the Pike National Forest are reserved from all forms of entry and location and set aside as a municipal water-supply reserve.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is technically correct, and for that reason I wish to ask him whether he would object to an amendment reserving the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MANN. So that the Government may really retain control.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have no objection to that whatever.

Mr. MANN. Then I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois if he does not think that the provision should be put in that the Government incurs no liability thereby.

Mr. MANN. No; I do not think that is necessary.

Mr. FOSTER. We have seen when we have changed the law the Government has incurred liability in regard to the undertaking.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to such a provision, but that is not usual.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Illinois, I think, has put that in several bills.

Mr. MANN. Yes; I put it in the dam bill and I believe in the general bridge bill, but this proposition is to grant the use of certain lands for water-supply purposes. The Department of the Interior recommended that there be reserved out of the grant any land which could be used for power purposes, but the committee did not put that provision in the bill, and there may be good reason for not putting it in. I can see objections to it. If the cities create the power by construction of dams, they might properly utilize that power and the Government would have nothing to do with it. On the other hand, we do not convey the title of the land by the bill. If Congress should want to make any change in regard to this at any time there would be difficulty and dispute about the power of Congress to do it. I have no doubt that under any ordinary conditions the land will always be used by the municipalities for water purposes. I do not believe the Government would incur any liability, although I do not say so.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not, either.

Mr. MANN. But, on the other hand, here are two municipalities and we are entitled to treat them a little more leniently than we would corporations organized for profit. These municipalities exist only as a matter of common good, and if they are proposing to expend some money to create a reservoir, complete dams, laying water-supply pipes, and perhaps having to do it through the borrowing of money, I really think that if we change it so as to interfere with that we ought to take into consideration the possibility of paying them damages, they not being a private corporation.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman will recollect that this matter came up in the consideration of the bill paying for the bridge across Weymouth Back River, where the Government ordered a draw put in.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but there was no question there but that we had the power to do it without liability.

Mr. FOSTER. The fact is the provision of law did not say that we incurred no liability, and then the claim was made that we ought to pay.

Mr. MANN. No; but I will say that the bridge at that place was ordered removed under a provision in the river and harbor act of 1899, which has been applied in a number of cases and has been sustained by the court wherever it has been tested, and it has been tested a number of times. The courts have held without liability at all on the part of the Government it can order these bridges removed and reconstructed and incur no liability.

Mr. FOSTER. I realize that, and yet the gentleman will recall that in that case the Government did pay several thousand dollars.

Mr. MANN. Yes; and I think they ought to have paid more. That was a matter of equity and fair dealing and not a matter of liability.

Mr. FOSTER. Some of these cases may come back with a claim of equity asking the Government to pay it where the Government reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal the law.

Mr. MANN. I presume that if these municipalities carry out their plans they will have to do it with borrowed money, and it is very likely that doing it with borrowed money they will have to give as security the work that is produced by the aid of the money. Now, these cities, Colorado Springs, Colorado City, and Manitou——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; three cities.

Mr. MANN. The grant runs to two, but it covers three. I have been there a good many times, and I suppose almost every other Member has. There is every reason in the world why they should be given the right to have this water supply that is on the north side of Pikes Peak, as I understand.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Just let me state this to my colleague. When it comes to borrowing money, if it is necessary to complete the waterworks or extend it. I do not think the fact that this provision is in the bill will affect their ability to borrow money.

Mr. MANN. It might affect it quite a good deal.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think so. Bonds are issued by municipalities, and I do not see how it can affect them.

Mr. MANN. I do not know under what system they issue bonds, but they are sometimes issued against the plants, where they have water plants. Whether that be the case here or not, I do not know.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Public Lands gave this measure very careful attention, and the suggestions made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] were all very carefully considered by the committee. Supplementing what has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], I desire to state that this bill contemplates the highest use, in my opinion, for which these lands are capable of being used. The cities of Manitou and Colorado Springs are great health resorts and are visited annually by many thousands of citizens from all parts of the United States and of the world. It is necessary that some provision be made for the protection of their water supply, and after many months of consideration of the subject matter the committee decided that the provisions of the bill were the very least that ought to be granted to these two cities. I desire to suggest to the gentleman that, having considered those subjects very carefully, no amendment should be made to the bill which would embarrass the carrying out of the purpose for which the bill is to be passed, and I believe that the amendments he suggests might do that. I would urge no objection to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to the reservation of the right to alter, amend, or repeal.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my colleague takes the position that the right to alter, amend, or repeal being reserved to the Government, if it ever becomes necessary for the Government in the exercise of that right to alter, amend, or repeal, that the National Government ought not to be called on to pay out any money.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, there is nothing of that kind contemplated. There is nothing of that kind possible under the bill, under a fair construction, and in my judgment under a legal construction of the bill. The entire liability on the part of the Government is the right of the Government to participate through its forest officers in the policing of the reservation, and we want that, we think that is necessary, and to say that the Government shall assume no liability might cause it to be held by the courts that the Government could not even do that, and we want that done.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to say that I am not opposed to this bill. I believe in the object of the bill, in the protection of the water supply for those cities. I do suggest to the gentleman that the National Government ought to have its rights protected as well.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am suggesting to the gentleman that the rights of the Government are protected in so far as the right to alter, amend, or repeal the bill is concerned. That amendment should be adopted for this reason: The time may come when the National Government may want to use some small portion of this land for different purposes, and when that small portion of land is not necessary for the purposes of this bill, and in that event it might become necessary to have an amendment of that sort adopted.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman, in that case, does not think there ought to be any liability on the part of the Government?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have stated repeatedly that I do not think there is any liability on the part of the Government, and if the gentleman will read the bill I do not believe he will contend there is any liability further than the one to help police it through its forest officers.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, I have read the bill and I understand it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Arkansas I think does not catch the point that my colleague makes when he speaks of liability of the Government. He means liability by reason of alteration of law. The question is whether, having the right to alter, amend, or repeal, if you do alter or amend the law it affects the rights of the municipalities, and if you have damaged them any, whether you have to pay them.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think the Government ought to put itself in a position where it could not be required under some circumstances to recognize the rights of the cities. I do not believe that amendment is proper and I do not believe the gentleman should press it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I may say that this bill was carefully considered by both the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, and also the forest reserve people, in conjunction with the mayor and city attorney of Colorado Springs, and they jointly prepared this language and recommend it as the agreed-upon measure of the two departments for the protection from pollution of the water of those two cities. I want to call attention to a portion of my report upon this bill as follows:

The city of Colorado Springs owns its water-supply system and has expended several million dollars in perfecting its municipal plant. The city has a population of about 30,000. The city of Colorado City, though a separate municipality, adjoins Colorado Springs and is virtually a part of it, has a population of 6,000, and gets its water from the Colorado Springs water-supply system. The town of Manitou has a population of about 2,000. The addition of the adjacent population which secures its water supply from the city of Colorado Springs and Manitou aggregates a population of about 50,000, which is increasing very rapidly. Colorado Springs and Manitou, as everyone knows, are situated at the foot of Pikes Peak. They are among the most noted resort places of the world. There are approximately 100,000 tourists visit those cities every season, and large numbers of them spread over the sides of Pikes Peak and camp out on the small streams, springs, and reservoirs which supply those cities with water.

The cities have no possible way of securing water except from the southerly, easterly, and northerly slopes of Pikes Peak.

The snowfall and precipitation in that territory are necessarily limited, and as those cities increase in population the problem of securing a pure-water supply is not only important but is becoming very serious. In fact, it has become imperatively necessary for the continued growth of those cities and the health of the inhabitants that their available water supply be conserved and protected from pollution. There is no possible way of preserving the water from contamination and pollution and maintaining its purity excepting by some systematic regulations of the use and occupation of the land from which the waters are derived.

While the cities do not desire to exclude the public from the slopes of Pikes Peak, nevertheless the health of from 50,000 to 100,000 people is of very much greater importance than the unrestricted liberties of campers in that territory. It was shown that the people exercise little or no restrictions whatever in their habits upon the streams and reservoirs of the water that is diverted direct from them through pipes to the cities and necessarily pollutes the water more or less, and it is absolutely imperative that the cities be given the right to join with the forest-reserve officials in policing and guarding and regulating the use of the lands described in this bill, which are now within the forest reserve and situated on the northern slope of Pikes Peak. The forest-reserve officers are not sufficient and do not and can not under existing regulations protect the water supply of those cities.

On his trip West last summer the attention of the President of the United States was called to this situation by the Chamber of Commerce of Colorado Springs and the officials and city authorities and public-spirited citizens, and the President promised to give the matter his careful consideration.

The mayor of Colorado Springs and other public officials have been before your committee and have had a full hearing. While there was opposition to the original bill, H. R. 27434, of the Sixty-first Congress, and H. R. ———, Sixty-second Congress, which provided for the conveyance of the land direct to the city, and there was some opposition to the present bill as recommended by the Interior Department and Agriculture Department, yet after section 5 of the bill was added, fully disavowing the intention of injuring or affecting in any way the legal rights of anyone, there was little or no opposition to the bill in its present form.

The bill grants no lands whatever to either Colorado Springs or Manitou, and grants no water right whatever. In fact, the Government does not own any water rights and could not grant any. There is no property of the United States Government of any kind granted by this bill. It merely authorizes the forest reserve officials, in conjunction with the cities, to adopt such regulations as may be necessary to prevent the pollution and preserve the purity of the waters used by those three cities.

The lands referred to in this bill have been carefully examined by the Forest Service officials and it is a matter of general knowledge that the lands are of comparatively no value whatever for agricultural or mineral or any other purpose, as it consists of the steep, rocky north slope of Pikes Peak; and it was very positively shown by the hearings that neither the Government nor the public would suffer any inconvenience or loss by the withdrawal of those lands from entry.

There would be very much more reason and justice in allowing the city of Colorado Springs and town of Manitou to secure title to the lands referred to in this bill than there was for the act of Congress of February 28, 1911 (36 Stat., 959), "authorizing the city of Seattle, Wash., to purchase certain lands for the protection of the source of its water supply." Colorado Springs and Manitou have been endeavoring for two years to secure the passage of a similar bill to the Seattle one and upon identically the same terms. But owing to the opposition of the Forest Service and one or two private interests, and owing to the city being compelled to make extensive improvements to its water-supply system, the city authorities are practically forced to consent to the enactment of the present bill.

It is believed by your committee that Congress can not consistently refuse to authorize the cooperation of the Forest Service officials with the municipalities in the suitable guarding and protection of the public lands which contain the source of their water supply; that the precedent which would thereby be established would be meritorious and highly commendable in aiding municipalities in the protection of their water supply from contamination and pollution. It is believed that there can be no higher or more commendable use of Government land—especially the kind of land referred to in this case—than to supply pure water for the inhabitants of the cities and towns. A city that has no other source of water supply can not consent to or permit people under any pretense to make deposits of offal or contaminating matters in its water supply. The consideration of pure water far outweighs any other consideration that may be presented concerning the lands referred to herein. If this bill be enacted into law, these municipalities will have such control, under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Forest Service, over the watershed of the north slope of Pikes Peak as will enable them to establish such rules and regulations as will insure the purity of their water supply. It will be in their interest to make these regulations as liberal to their visitors who wish to go upon these watersheds as water conditions will permit.

When it is considered that the Government conveys no property whatever, that no vested rights whatever are affected by this bill, and the meritorious objects of the measure are appreciated, no fair-minded or reasonable people can justly oppose an act by Congress which will give these municipalities such control over their water supply as is shown to be necessary to preserve the health of their inhabitants.

The Secretary of the Interior has submitted to the committee a supplemental report, which is attached hereto. The committee does not deem it either wise or necessary to adopt this suggestion of the Secretary, because, while the city is not engaged in the generation of power, nevertheless the city does own its own water plant, and if the increase of its reservoirs or the additional expenditures which the city contemplates in further conserving the waters belonging to it should generate any additional power it is deemed that these cities that have expended large amounts of the inhabitants' money are entitled to the benefits of any power they may create, and it is deemed that that provision would not only be unjust and unfair to those cities, but would materially interfere with the improvements and use of their municipal system, and probably interfere with their placing of the bonds necessary for the city to make the improvements contemplated for the growth of the city.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is a very commendable thing.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The city of Colorado Springs owns land on the south and east slopes of Pikes Peak, and I have been earnestly trying for two years to get a bill reported allowing the city the same kind of a title that we gave the city of Seattle to protect her water supply, to protect the water on the north slope. But owing to the opposition of the Agricultural Department and the Forest Service and some private interests I have been unable to secure a favorable recommendation for such a bill. This bill simply provides that under the supervision of the Agricultural Department the city officials can do certain things—they can police this land and protect the city's water supply from pollution. People camp all over that slope of the peak, and they almost of necessity contaminate the water of those small streams more or less.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not opposed to the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. But the gentleman is very seriously opposing the bill when he asks this House to adopt such an amendment as he suggests.

Mr. FOSTER. The amendment I propose is only for the protection of the National Government.

Mr. ROBINSON. Suppose these cities interested should construct expensive reservoirs?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. And spend over a million dollars, as they must do.

Mr. ROBINSON. And suppose they spent from a million to five million dollars in the construction of the reservoir, and the Government should, for some reasons which appeared manifestly necessary, repeal this act, would the gentleman from Illinois or any other fair-minded man insist that they should have the right to repeal without responding in any sense to those cities for the enormous expenditure in which they have been involved?

Mr. FOSTER. That is a hypothetical case I do not propose to answer.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the gentleman will state a hypothetical case which will support the amendment which he suggests as necessary to protect the Government, I would like to hear it.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say it is a good plan in passing these bills that in the future the interest of the Government may be protected. Men come here and very frequently ask the Government to make concessions and give away property and all that, and yet it is done because our constituents ask us to do it——

Mr. ROBINSON. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. FOSTER. And for good purposes, too. I am not complaining of this at all, but at the same time it seems to me that the National Government ought to be protected in its rights.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow us to consider the bill and then present the amendment or amendments he may desire?

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection at all; not in the least.

Mr. MONDELL. Very well.

Mr. FOSTER. Do not understand me as being opposed to the protection of the water supply of any portion of this country. This came up as a suggestion of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. None at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 15, 16, and 17, on page 7, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"for in section 50 of the act entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States, approved March 4, 1909 (35 Stat. L., 1098), as amended by the act of Congress approved June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. L., 857).'"

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by adding as a new section the following:

The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding as a new section the following:

"The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment the following:

"And the United States shall incur no liability by the alteration, amendment, or repeal thereof to the owner or owners or any other persons interested."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, what is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I hope that amendment will not be adopted. There is no reason or justice in adding an additional burden by inserting a revocation clause that you never have before put in a bill, so far as I know, since I have been in Congress. It seems to me when this is a measure of absolute necessity to protect the health and lives of 60,000 people, and when they have to spend over a million dollars in the betterment of their waterworks systems along the north slope of Pikes Peak, they should not be handicapped in such a way that they could not sell the bonds or know what kind of a temporary right they are getting. I am confident the citizens of those municipalities would rather have no law at all than to have it so that they can not invest their money with safety. I have no objection to the usual reservation clause that we place in the statutes every day. While I think it is unnecessary and really ought not be put in, I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. But the amendment to the amendment is utterly unwarranted. I feel it renders the bill comparatively worthless. I want these cities to either get something plain and definite or nothing at all. I can not agree to a provision that would always be a cloud upon their rights and probably lead to litigation and loss of vast property rights. I hope the amendment to the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I am not personally particular as to whether the House adopts this amendment or not. I offer it as a safeguard in these bills to the National Government. We are here legislating not only for Illinois, Colorado, Massachusetts, Ohio, and the rest of the States, but we are supposed to be legislating for the United States, for the National Government. And it seems to me that the placing of such an amendment as this does not affect the ability of the city of Colorado Springs nor of Manitou nor of Colorado City to borrow whatever money may be necessary for the construction of this reservoir, the laying of the mains and pipes, and so forth. I do not know whether there will ever be any liability on this or not. I hope not. But I do suggest that in a matter of this kind, if it becomes necessary for the National Government to alter, amend, or repeal this law, the people should not be asked to pay for something that might occur out in the State of Colorado or Illinois, or any other State. I believe the rights of the people are paramount to any particular municipality or locality. And so I have offered this amendment, which is not an unusual one, as stated by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who suggested this amendment be placed upon another bill, where they were expending possibly more than $1,000,000 for the development of a water power. And I think many men here in this House to-day voted very readily for that amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois at that time.

I did not hear any man say that he would not take the right granted by the National Government; but I think overwhelmingly this House, and probably the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR]—although I do not know—voted for it. There was not much opposition to an amendment of this kind when it was offered upon this floor during the last session of Congress. Now, when we are here offering to protect the rights of the National Government and provide that the National Government shall not be liable for any amendment, alteration, or repeal of this law, gentlemen throw up their hands in horror and say: "Are you going to say to these people that the Government shall not be liable if we ask them to amend this bill or appeal it in some way?" I believe these people will be willing—and I am sure they ought to be willing—to take this land, and I want them to have it. But I want them to have it with the proper regulation and with the proper protection to the National Government.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me suggest that Congress has for 50 years been granting lands unconditionally to cities and towns for municipal purposes. Why should you now for the first time try to inflict these harsh restrictions on these two cities?

Mr. FOSTER. The National Government has in the past been giving away many, many valuable rights and many, many valuable acres of land and water-power sites, more than they ever will give away in the future.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; Congress has been exceeding liberal in giving away the public property to private corporations. But these are municipal corporations that own their waterworks systems. They are vastly different from private corporations.

Mr. FOSTER. But Congress will not do it in the future.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It will continue to grant the property and power to the cities necessary for the protection of their water supply. There can be no higher use of public land than that. The gentleman is evidently trying to kill the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no objection to the city policing this land and having control of it. I want them to have it to protect their water supply. But at the same time I want to keep in mind the interest of the National Government in these matters, so that we may not in years to come—the National Government will not be compelled to pay thousands of dollars because we do not protect it now.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think that in engrafting his amendment upon this bill he would make it harder than it would otherwise be for the people of Colorado Springs and Manitou to sell their bonds?

Mr. FOSTER. Well, does not the gentleman from Texas think that a city of 30,000 inhabitants and a town of 2,000 inhabitants, with all the millions of property they own, ought to be able to borrow money even under such a restriction as that on this bill? If they are not able, I will declare they are different from what I think the people of Colorado are. I think the people of Colorado and the people of those cities are enterprising citizens, and I have a good opinion of their ability.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why should you want to handicap them with lawsuits and uncertainty?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not seeking to handicap them in the least.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why does the gentleman for the first time in his official career favor the engrafting of such an amendment on a bill?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman that I have voted for such amendments as this heretofore.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. This is the first time I have ever heard of it since I have been a Member of Congress. That kind of a restrictive provision in this law would be nothing less than an outrage upon those cities for all time to come. There is no necessity or justification for it.

Mr. FOSTER. It should go on a bill of this kind the same as on any other kind. I think this amendment will not work hardship on the people of Colorado. I have a very good opinion of those people.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] understands the character of the legislation, otherwise he would not have offered his amendment.

Under the act of 1905 the cities of Colorado Springs and Manitou could secure many of the rights granted in this bill in absolute perpetuity. That act gives them the right to lay their pipes, erect dams, develop water power, and do all those things that they will do under this bill except that the bill goes further and provides for a general reservation of the watershed. But if the cities proceed under the act of 1905 their rights would be fixed for all time.

Now, it has been deemed wise to grant those same rights with the provision that Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal. It is not at all probable that Congress will ever alter or amend in a way that would be confiscatory of the cities' investment, but it is altogether possible that that might be done, and it might occur that it would be in the public interest in a larger public sense than that of these cities for Congress, under its reserved authority and power, to pass an act that would be confiscatory of the property created under this law. Surely the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] would not suggest that under those circumstances we should take from the cities a right to a reasonable recompense for the loss that might occur under those circumstances. As the matter stands, a revocable permit—revocable at the will of Congress—is not likely to be repealed in a way greatly to injure the cities; and yet Congress proposes, and wisely I think, to reserve the right to repeal in a way that might be absolutely confiscatory of the created property, and in doing that, of course, the property would become valuable to the Government for some other use, and we should not say that under those circumstances it should not pay.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that under the law to which the gentleman has referred, and under the general doctrine of riparian rights and prior appropriation of water, these cities have the right to use this water?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; but particularly under the act I have referred to, because it was an act passed to cover just such cases, giving rights in perpetuity to municipalities.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman again yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not also a fact that the only thing this bill would accomplish is to permit these people, by using the northern slope of Pikes Peak, to get the water from the snow melting from this peak, and that it only gives them the right to prevent the water from being polluted before it reaches the main?

Mr. MONDELL. That is all it does—prevents pollution and enables the cities to acquire necessary rights.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like a minute or two in order to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Request is made that the time of the gentleman from Wyoming be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to know whether the Government of the United States does not own all the land described in this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. It has dedicated it to the two cities of Colorado Springs and Manitou?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And the gentleman favors the dedication of this land to the cities without any protection whatever, so that if at some future time the Government of the United States should find itself in a position where it ought to repeal or amend or modify the bill, it should recompense the people to whom it had dedicated the land for any investment that they may have made on Government property? Is that it?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has fallen into a curious error and therefore makes a curious misstatement.

Mr. MADDEN. I am asking the gentleman a question.

Mr. MONDELL. He says I am objecting to the Government protecting itself. Not at all. The Government has nothing to protect itself in further than it has protected itself by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. What I am objecting to is the proposition that the bill shall be so amended that the cities shall have no protection, although the Government may confiscate all their property. That is all there is to it. Of course, if the gentleman thinks the Government should hold land from use by its citizens or not allow them to use it, or, if it does allow them to use it, provide that it shall be under conditions that are impossible—if that is the gentleman's notion of a proper Government policy, he wants to get a fairer and more accurate notion of the Government. We have a law under which the city could secure all these rights in perpetuity, and we are now giving them the lands under a permit revocable at the will of Congress, but we say that if Congress repeals the permit in a way to confiscate or injure the property it certainly will do it with the idea of using that property itself in some other way, and therefore it ought to pay for it.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman concedes that the property belongs to the Government, does he not?

Mr. MONDELL. Nothing belongs to the Government but the land.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, the land.

Mr. MONDELL. The improvements that will be placed upon it will belong to the people of Colorado Springs and Manitou.

Mr. MADDEN. These people who want to make these improvements understand that they can not make them unless the Government of the United States concedes to them the right to use this property.

Mr. MONDELL. And I assume that the gentleman would not have the people of the West placed in such a position that they could not improve their country except under a permit that could be revoked the day after, thereby confiscating all the improvements they had made.

Mr. MADDEN. Most people in other sections of the country improve property which they buy.

Mr. MONDELL. These people were perfectly willing to buy this land, and wanted to buy it, but the Government did not want to sell it.

Mr. MADDEN. The Government has the right to refuse to sell it, and it has the right to impose conditions.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The amendment of Mr. FOSTER to the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

PARK LAND, BOULDER AND CANON CITY, COLO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 19339) granting public lands to the cities of Boulder and Canon City, in the State of Colorado, for public-park purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted and conveyed to the following-named municipal corporations in the State of Colorado for public-park purposes, and for the use and benefit of the respective cities, the following-described land, or so much thereof as said cities may desire, to wit:

To the city of Canon City, county of Fremont, section 10, township 19 south, range 71 west of the sixth principal meridian, containing 640 acres, more or less.

To the city of Boulder, county of Boulder, the east half of the southeast quarter of section 11; west half of section 13; east half of the northeast quarter, east half of the southeast quarter, and southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 14; east half of section 23; northwest quarter and the west half of the southwest quarter and the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 24; all in township 1 south, range 71 west of the sixth principal meridian.

Provided, That this act shall be subject to all the conditions and the same provisions as are contained in section 2 of an act entitled "An act granting public lands to certain cities and towns in the State of Colorado for public-park purposes," approved June 7, 1910 (36 U. S. Stats., 459).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this bill starts out as a direct grant, which, as I remarked with reference to another bill to-day, is a conveyance, and requires no patent. The latter part of the bill then proposes that a patent shall be issued, by reference to another law. Has the gentleman any objection to changing the first part?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; I have no objection to making the same change that you made in the other bill. I will simply say to the gentleman from Illinois that this act follows the identical language of the act of 1910, by which these other towns got their park land.

Mr. MANN. I am aware of that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, do I understand that this land is to be conveyed only for park purposes?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is what the bill says.

Mr. MANN. That is not what it says, and that is why I asked the question. It says, "For park purposes and for the use and benefit of the respective cities."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am willing to strike out the word "and," if that is the question. That is all they want it for. You can strike out the word "and" and the comma.

Mr. MANN. Yes; so as to make it "for park purposes." Of course the department recommended the provision be inserted reserving the oil and mineral rights. Is the gentleman willing to accept the same sort of amendment that went into the last bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. And is the gentleman willing to accept the same amendment that I offered to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; I would not want to accept that amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I will object.

Mr. MANN. I will say that I do not think there is the same objection to inserting the amendment offered by my colleague in this bill that there was in the other bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not think there is, except there is no expenditure here.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] withdraw his objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I will reserve the right to object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he is going hereafter to insert this provision in all the bills or is he simply making an example of me?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no; I have the kindest feeling for the gentleman and the great State of Colorado; but I have some consideration for the people whom I represent.

Mr. MANN. I can say to the gentleman from Colorado that if both my colleague and myself did not have the kindest regard for the gentleman from Colorado we would not have let the bill which has just passed go through which gave the city of Colorado Springs and Manitou a large amount of land to be policed and watched for fire at the Government expense.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not think so. I do not object to this amendment. There is no expenditure of money about this. It is a barren piece of ground and has lain there for 40 years, waste land.

Mr. FOSTER. But you can not tell what it will be worth 40 years from now.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have no objection to the amendment going in.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, in line 3, page 1, by striking out the words "there is hereby granted and conveyed" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to convey."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, strike out the words "there is hereby granted and conveyed" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to convey."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Now Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out, in line 5, the comma and the word "and."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the comma after the word "purposes" and the word "and" immediately following.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. I move to amend by adding a new section, "Section 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

Mr. FOSTER. And, Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the amendment by adding the following: "And the United States shall incur no liability for the alteration, amendment, or repeal thereof to the owner or owners or any other persons interested."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a part of this land has been covered by patents.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There is a clause here which reserves all that.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman if there is any provision in this bill by which if the land is not used for park purposes it shall revert to the Government.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; that provision is in the bill. The gentleman will see it in the report on page 3:

And that if the said lands shall not be used as public parks the same or such parts thereof not so used shall revert to the United States.

Mr. COOPER. Is the gentleman reading from the report?

Mr. MANN. That is in section 2 of the act referred to in the proviso. This is made subject to the provisions of that law.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I understand that an amendment has been offered by the gentleman from Colorado reserving the right to alter, amend, or repeal this law, and that a supplementary amendment has been offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], providing that the United States shall not be liable under this act. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is a sale of land at $1.25 an acre. We are selling these town lands at $1.25 an acre. It is to be their land after it is purchased. It is an outright sale of land for park purposes, rocky, broken, mountainous land, of no value for anything but park purposes; but out of an abundance of caution we reserve to the United States all the coal and oil that may be under the land, and the right to enter for the purpose of extracting these minerals from the land.

It does seem to me that when we sell land and charge for it it is scarcely fair or reasonable or equitable to reserve the right to alter or amend or, in other words, to take back the bargain. Either the Government ought to sell these lands to these towns or it ought not to. The reservation in itself is in my opinion ridiculous, but it is in the other bill. It was insisted upon, and it went in because the people responsible for the legislation could not help themselves. They either had to accept it or not get the legislation, which is often the case, and now it is proposed to burden these other reservations with more reservations. I doubt if any city or town anywhere would care to buy public land at the ordinary public-land price of one dollar and a quarter an acre with a reservation to the Government of all the mineral in the land, and then have a string attached to the patent under which the Government can jerk it back any time, confiscate all of the improvements on the land, and double clinch and copper rivet the thing by a provision that if that is done the Government shall not be responsible for its nefarious acts. I do not believe the gentlemen really intended to do that.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think that the Government ever acts nefariously?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not believe the gentlemen really intended that these amendments shall apply to this sort of a transfer of property. I doubt whether either of the gentlemen realizes the conditions of this sale, for it is a straight-out sale of land for one dollar and a quarter an acre.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may except me from that. I have a memorandum of the whole thing right here.

Mr. MONDELL. I can not understand why the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], now for the first time in the history of the Government, proposes to put such a provision into a bill providing for a sale and transfer of real estate by the Government, rocky, broken, comparatively worthless mountain land, to municipalities, not to individuals or grasping corporations, but to some good people who have associated themselves together in a municipal corporation and who desire to beautify the surrounding territory.

We charge them one dollar and a quarter an acre. That of itself is not a very reasonable proceeding on the part of a great Government under the circumstances. We reserve all sorts of minerals that are not present out of excess of caution. We charge all that we charge anybody if we did not reserve the minerals. It is now proposed that the city shall buy, if they do buy, with the understanding that day after to-morrow we could take it all back and not repay the dollar and a quarter for the land, not reimburse them for any improvements they may have placed upon it; and in order to fix it so that there will be no getting away from it, the gentleman from Illinois proposes to put in the bond to exact the pound of flesh and the blood that flows with it. I can not believe that the gentlemen really want that sort of an amendment adopted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to grant to the city of Boulder 1,200 acres of land for park purposes. The city of Boulder is not a very large city. It has heretofore acquired at one time from the Government for park purposes 139 acres, at another time 1,601 acres, at another time 1,524 acres. One would suppose that the city of Boulder was well supplied with land for park purposes, when it has in the neighborhood of more than 3,000 acres for that purpose, not quite an acre to a man, but at least more than an acre to 10 men. A portion of the land that is now proposed to be conveyed at $1.25 an acre has heretofore been reserved by the Government for power purposes. The gentleman from Wyoming, who does not believe the Government ought to have any control over power purposes, did not mention that fact. This land is already reserved by the Government under an act of Congress for power purposes, and the gentleman proposes to take it out of the hands of the Government for power purposes. My amendment proposes to leave the control of it in the hands of the Government for power purposes. The well-known animosity of the gentleman from Wyoming against any control of the Government over the Government lands in the Western States does not need further comment.

Mr. MONDELL. There is no animosity on the part of the gentleman from Wyoming against the people of a municipality developing water power and using it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I merely want to state that the city of Boulder is the seat of the State university. It is one of the prettiest cities in the West. The residents of the city and the State generally are trying to make it one of the most attractive and important educational centers of this country. This park will be an additional feature and will materially add to the scenic attractiveness of the city. This mountain to which you refer is simply a kind of amphitheater around the city which is covered by a growth of pinon, or, rather, scrubby pine trees. If this land was worth anything, it would have been taken in private ownership 30 years ago. The city simply wants this tract of mountain side to prevent anybody acquiring it and removing these trees, and thus disfiguring the background and surroundings of the city. The gentleman is mistaken about this park for the city of Boulder having a water-power reservation. That is in the Canon City park bill. That is in a canyon off from Canon City. The land is worthless for any other purpose. The authorities are building a road to it by convict labor and beautifying it as a drive and an outing place.

Mr. MANN. What mistake did I make about the city of Boulder? I read from the report on this bill that the city of Boulder had acquired for park purposes the amount of land to which I have referred.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly; but, as I was stating, the power site is not in the proposed Boulder park, but it is in the Canon City park.

Mr. MANN. It is in this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes; but the Government's rights are all reserved in the bill. The mayor and city council of Boulder filed with the committee a memorial in support of this bill, which in part reads as follows:

Your memorialists, the mayor and city council of said city of Boulder, respectfully represent that the lands hereinbelow described are in the mountains or foothills west of and near to our city and adjoin the lands heretofore granted to our city by the act of Congress of February 28, 1899, and are of almost no value except for the sparse growth of native trees thereon.

They are necessary to round out and complete the lands that ought to be included in the park lands of the city and to prevent, so far as possible, the beauty of the foothills within sight of the city being spoiled by the destruction of the timber thereon; that much of the native timber formerly growing on the lands herein asked for has been cut off in the early years of settlement of said county, and that only a small proportion thereof now remains, chiefly small pine and spruce trees and entirely unfit for lumber or building purposes; that this small remainder is being constantly diminished by trespassers for firewood and by careless setting out of fires; that it will be an advantage to the inhabitants of this city, and of this county that said remaining trees be, if possible, protected and preserved; that if the Government will grant said lands to our city for the preservation of said remaining trees, our city will take pleasure and exercise its best endeavors in caring for and preserving the trees now remaining on said lands, and will plant and encourage the planting of other trees thereon; that said lands are near to and of easy access from our State university and contain no mines or minerals or any mining claims of any known value; that said lands have been open to settlement under the land laws of the United States for more than 50 years, but that no one up to this date has filed on or claims any of said lands.

We therefore respectfully request you, if in harmony with your duties as officers of the Government, to present and, if practicable, to secure the passage of a bill granting to the city of Boulder, in the State of Colorado, the lands herein described for park purposes and for the preservation of the native trees on said lands.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MONDELL) there were—ayes 32, noes 1.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

EXCHANGE OF CERTAIN LANDS WITH THE STATE OF MICHIGAN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4012) to authorize the exchange of certain lands with the State of Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4012) to authorize the exchange of certain lands with the State of Michigan.

Be it enacted, etc., That, upon the request of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of the Interior shall accept on behalf of the United States the relinquishment or conveyance to the United States, by or from the State of Michigan, of any lands covered by its unperfected claims under the land laws of the United States, or of any lands owned or controlled by the State of Michigan which the said State of Michigan is willing to relinquish or convey to the United States, and which, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, should be included in, or made a part of, or set aside as and for a national forest in said State; and upon such acceptance the lands so relinquished or conveyed shall immediately, and by force of this act alone, be reserved and set aside as national-forest lands, and is hereby made subject to all the laws affecting other national forests.

SEC. 2. That the State of Michigan is hereby authorized to select, in lieu of any lands relinquished or conveyed to the United States under the foregoing provisions of this act, other lands of equal area and approximately equal value from any part of the unappropriated public lands in said State, including lands within a national forest and lands withdrawn from entry without other special reservation. A description of the lands selected, together with a description of the lands relinquished or conveyed, or intended to be relinquished or conveyed under this act, shall be filed with the Secretary of Agriculture: Provided, That the question as to whether any lands intended to be relinquished or conveyed under the provisions of this act are approximately equal in value to the lands selected and whether the mutual exchange of said lands would be beneficial to the public interests subserved by the national forests in the State of Michigan shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 3. That upon the certification of the Secretary of the Interior by the Secretary of Agriculture that the lands selected and the lands relinquished or conveyed are of equal value, and that the exchange of said lands would be beneficial to the administration of the national forests in the State of Michigan, the Secretary of the Interior shall determine, in accordance with the rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, whether the lands selected by the State are unappropriated lands, and if so found he shall issue a patent for said selected lands to the State of Michigan: Provided, That no deed or other instrument of conveyance shall be accepted by the United States until the Attorney General of the United States shall certify that a good and sufficient title to such lands is vested in the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand that this bill is to permit the State of Michigan and the Government to exchange lands in their forest reservations so that the State may have a forest reserve in a compact body and the Government in the same manner.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. Now, the original bill provided for the relinquishment by the State of its unperfected claims under the land laws of the United States or of any lands controlled by the State. The committee proposes to strike out by amendment the unperfected claims, and so forth, and leave in the words "relinquishment or." Is there any land which the State can relinquish to which it has a perfect title? If it owns land, it conveys by conveyance, does it not?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, there is no land in the State of Michigan to which those words would apply.

Mr. MANN. Then I suppose there is no objection to striking them out.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. There will be no objection to striking them out. I will say to the gentleman that this bill, in its original form, was framed in the Department of Agriculture. It was then submitted to the Secretary of the Interior, who made certain criticisms upon it. It was then resubmitted to the Secretary of Agriculture, with the criticisms of the Secretary of the Interior, and to these criticisms the Secretary of Agriculture agreed and expressed a willingness that the changes should be made, and it was the intention of the Committee on Public Lands to make the amendments in the act as suggested by the Secretary of the Interior, but through inadvertence it left in the words "relinquishment or" or "relinquished or" in a good many places in the bill, and if no objection is made to the consideration of the bill it is my purpose, when the time comes, to ask that those words be stricken out.

Mr. MANN. Now, then, one more question, or, maybe, two: Section 2 of the bill proposes that before the selections made by the State are carried into effect by conveyance from the Government the Secretary of Agriculture must approve the selection.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Absolutely.

Mr. MANN. But it reads:

That the State of Michigan is hereby authorized to select in lieu of any lands relinquished or conveyed.

Ought it not to be that the State of Michigan is authorized to make application to select?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Of course, the selection would not be valid until it was agreed to on the part of the authorities of the United States, as provided for in section 1.

Mr. MANN. That is one of the criticisms the Secretary of the Interior makes of this bill, and it occurred to me possibly if the State of Michigan should file a selection of a particular part of land and it was not approved there might be a cloud upon the title to that land.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I have no objection to the suggestion of the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman from Illinois will notice, the word "shall," in line 4, page 1, is stricken out and the word "may" inserted.

Mr. MANN. I do not think that makes a particle of difference.

Mr. MONDELL. It makes a very great deal of difference.

Mr. MANN. Not from the standpoint of a lawyer, it does not.

Mr. MONDELL. It simply provides that the Secretary may accept. He is not required to accept anything.

Mr. MANN. I think he is. When the Secretary of Agriculture makes certification the Secretary of the Interior has nothing further to do except to make patent under section 3 of the bill. I do not think it makes any difference at all. "May" means "shall" under ordinary circumstances, and I do not thinks it makes any difference here.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I have not any objection to the amendment the gentleman suggests.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman understands that I do not object to the consideration of his bill in any event. I was going to suggest that there should be inserted in line 9, before the word "select," page 2, the words "make application to," and in line 15, the words "so applied for."

Mr. MONDELL. Where is that?

Mr. MANN. To read:

A description of the land so applied for shall be filed with the Secretary of Agriculture.

Instead of a description of the land selected.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MANN. I will be frank and say that I do not know whether it makes any change, but I notice the department made that objection as though it did amount to something coming from the Interior Department, and as it was not intended to have a selection amount to anything until it was approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, I do not see what objection there could be to the change.

Mr. MONDELL. As a matter of fact, there is no objection to the change except an objection that the change proposed is not uniform with the language generally used relative to State selections and in all general selections of that sort. I do not know as there is any objection to changing the language, but the word "selected" is generally used. The State selects and the Secretary of the Interior confirms the selection.

Mr. MANN. But it is not purely a matter of discretion on his part, like it is here with the Secretary of Agriculture. Where the State selects lieu lands for base lands, if it selects under ordinary conditions, the Secretary is bound to use the patent.

Mr. MONDELL. There are conditions in every case, as the gentleman knows. They may not be the same character of conditions, but there are always conditions.

Mr. MANN. But this is made on the recommendation or certification of the Secretary of Agriculture. Does the gentleman himself feel perfectly clear under such circumstances that if the State should file a notice of selection which was not approved by the Secretary of Agriculture that that would leave the title to that piece of property perfectly clear?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think it would. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is my authority upon questions relating to public lands, where the Western States are not trying to set off and get everything themselves. If he thinks that makes no difference, I will take his opinion in preference to the opinion of the Interior Department.

Mr. MONDELL. I am inclined to think the language used is more nearly in harmony with the language ordinarily used in cases of this kind than the language suggested, and I do not believe there would be any difficulty about it, although I do not believe there would be any objection to our accepting the amendment proposed.

Mr. MANN. I am calling it to the attention of the gentleman. The Secretary of the Interior did not make the matter very plain. He says:

> The first sentence of section 2 would imply a right in the State to select. The provisos to section 2 and section 3 seem to make this right subject to the approval of the Department of Agriculture. If this is intended it is suggested that after the word "to" in line 8, page 2, there be inserted the words "apply to."

Inserting the words "apply to" would not make sense, so far as that is concerned, and yet the purpose the Secretary had in making his report I have been trying to carry out in the language proposed.

Mr. MONDELL. The State selection in itself attaches no right whatever to the land, would not in this case, and does not in any case; and the act goes on to say that the State is authorized to select—that is, to give a description of the lands they desire in lieu of the lands relinquished under the foregoing provisions of this act. That is to give the description of the land they desire in lieu of lands relinquished under the foregoing provisions of this act. One of the provisions of this act is that they are lands which in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture should be included in or made a part of or set aside as a national forest.

Mr. MANN. That is not the lands selected. That is the lands conveyed to the Government.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand.

Mr. MANN. That is not the same proposition at all. The State does not select the lands for the Government. The State selects the lands now owned by the Government.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand it does and the Government need not make the exchange unless it sees fit to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, this bill is on the Union Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 1, line 4, strike out the word "shall" and insert in lieu thereof the word "may."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 1, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "covered by its unperfected claims under the land laws of the United States, or of any lands."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 1, line 8, strike out the words "or controlled."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 2, line 6, strike out the words "is hereby made" and insert the word "be."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

> Page 2, lines 13 and 14, strike out the words "and lands withdrawn from entry without other special reservation."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

> Page 3, lines 14 and 15, insert, after the word "States," in line 14, the words "by said conveyance."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I now move to strike out the words "relinquishment or," in line 5, page 1, and the words "relinquish or" and "relinquished or" wherever they appear in the bill.

The SPEAKER. It would be best to take them up separately. The Clerk will read the first one.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 1, line 5, strike out the words "relinquishment or."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. The next one is on line 10.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 1, line 10, strike out the words "relinquish or."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. The next one is on line 4 of page 2.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 2, line 4, strike out the words "relinquished or."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. The next amendment is on page 2, line 9, to strike out the words "relinquished or."

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 2, line 9, strike out the words "relinquished or."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. The next is on line 16.

> Page 2, line 16, strike out the words "relinquished or."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. The next is on lines 16 and 17.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 2, lines 16 and 17, strike out the words "relinquished or."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. The next is on line 19.

> Page 2, line 19, strike out the words "relinquished or."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, on page 3, line 3, I move to strike out the words "relinquished or."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 3, strike out the words "relinquished or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the word "of," in line 1, page 3, ought to be "to." It should be on certification "to" the Secretary of the Interior, instead "of" the Secretary of the Interior, by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. That is true. Let the gentleman offer the amendment.

Mr. MANN. On page 3, line 1, I move to strike out the word "of" and insert the word "to" where it first occurs.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 1, strike out the word "of" where it first occurs and insert the word "to."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

LAND TO SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, FOR RESERVOIR PURPOSES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 7002) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant to Salt Lake City, Utah, a right of way over certain public lands for reservoir purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to grant to Salt Lake City, Utah, under the provisions of section 4 of the act of February 1, 1905 (33 Stats., 628), a right of way on and over section 34, township 2 south, range 3 east, and sections 2 and 3, township 3 south, range 3 east, in Big Cottonwood Canyon, within the Wasatch National Forest, Salt Lake City land district, Utah, which lands have heretofore been reserved for reservoir purposes under and by virtue of the act of October 2, 1888 (35 Stats., 505).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like an explanation of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, the bill is designed to grant to the city of Salt Lake, Utah, under the provisions of existing law, a right of way over section 34, township 2 south, range 3 east, and sections 2 and 3, township 3 south, range 3 east, in Big Cottonwood Canyon, within the Wasatch National Forest, Salt Lake City land district, Utah, which lands have heretofore been reserved for reservoir purposes under and by virtue of the act of October 2, 1888. The city of Salt Lake finds it necessary to secure a right of way for waterworks over these lands, and this bill grants that right of way. If any further explanation is desired by the gentleman, I shall be glad to make it.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that bills of this character have been strenuously objected to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], but from the explanation given I can see no objection to the bill myself.

Mr. MANN. I never have objected to a bill of this character since I have been on earth.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman has not been on earth recently, then.

Mr. MANN. I have, but the gentleman has not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend page 2, line 3, by striking out the word "thirty" and inserting the word "twenty." The citation is erroneous.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, strike out the word "thirty" and insert the word "twenty."

Mr. MANN. It is not necessary to cite the statute, but when you do cite it you ought to get nearer than within 10 volumes of it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

EXTENSION OF CERTAIN HOMESTEAD RIGHTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 5309) to amend section 3 of the act of Congress approved May 14, 1880 (21 Stat. L., p. 140).

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of the act of Congress approved May 14, 1880 (21 Stat. L., p. 140), be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That any settler upon lands theretofore designated by the Secretary of the Interior as subject to the provisions of sections 1 to 5 of the enlarged-homestead acts of February 19, 1909 (35 Stat. L., p. 639), and June 17, 1910 (36 Stat. L., p. 531), shall be entitled to the preference right of entry accorded by this section, provided he shall have plainly marked the exterior boundaries of the lands claimed as his homestead: And provided further, That after the designation by the Secretary of the Interior of public lands for entry under the non-residence provisions of the enlarged-homestead acts of February 19, 1909, and June 17, 1910, any person who shall have plainly marked the exterior boundaries of the lands claimed under said provisions of law and made valuable improvements thereon shall have a preference right to enter the lands so claimed and improved at any time within three months after the date on which such lands become subject to entry; but such right shall forfeit unless the settler or claimant under the provisions of the enlarged-homestead acts shall annually cultivate and improve the lands in the form and manner and to the extent therein required following date of initiation of his claim hereunder: And provided further, That this act shall apply to all claims, locations, or entries made under the above-mentioned acts, where no adverse claims have intervened.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FINLEY. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to know whether I understand this bill. Four men have each taken up 160 acres, surrounding another 160 acres. As I understand the bill, it is intended to let any one of those four men mark the boundaries on that 160 acres and thereby secure a preference right.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Which one of the four is entitled to the preference?

Mr. MONDELL. The one who first exercises it.

Mr. MANN. Under what right?

Mr. MONDELL. Under the general rule of priority which prevails in all of the land laws of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Where that right prevails it prevails because it is conferred by statute.

Mr. MONDELL. Not in all cases, by any manner of means.

Mr. MANN. There is no priority unless it is given by statute.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does not mean that. Two homestead settlers under the law as it now stands may go on the same piece of land at approximately the same time, and the question of priority of settlement is the question always. In a thousand land cases that arises under the law, as it did in the Oklahoma rush cases.

Mr. MANN. That is what the law provides—that the one who gets there first and stays there is entitled to it.

Mr. MONDELL. That is what this provides; this is an extension of the priority right.

Mr. MANN. I am not going to object to the bill, I will say to the gentleman, for that reason.

Mr. MONDELL. It is not an objection.

Mr. MANN. It would be to anyone who wanted to provide in advance against litigation, for as sure as the sun rises tomorrow there will be trouble over this.

Mr. MONDELL. There can not be over this more than over the general provision to which this is a proviso.

Mr. MANN. It is not a proviso to anything of the sort; there is no preference given now to these people.

Mr. MONDELL. Not to this class.

Mr. MANN. So it is not an amendment to any proviso; it is a proposition to enact a new law which, it seems to me, possibly unobjectionable, gives to the man who is there a preference right to take the land adjoining what he already has. It gives each one of the four a preference right to take a particular tract of land.

Mr. MONDELL. It gives the man who does the thing required to establish his right the priority.

Mr. MANN. It gives the man who shall plainly mark the exterior boundaries the preference.

Mr. MONDELL. It gives it to the man who first marks it.

Mr. MANN. No; it does not say so and it does not mean so; the man who first marked it might withdraw his mark. It does not mean him, it means any one of the four who marks it. It will require one of those peculiar opinions in the Interior Department which the gentleman blames the department for making, but which in this case they will be compelled to make, not because of their lack of understanding, but because of our lack of understanding.

Mr. MONDELL. I must frankly acknowledge that this is a Senate act drawn by the department. The gentleman from Wyoming is constantly getting himself into trouble by mildly criticizing bills drawn by the department. Some people have been unkind enough to suggest that the gentleman from Wyoming is never satisfied with the phraseology of acts drawn by the department. In order to avoid that I am frank to say that I amend the department bills as little as I possibly can and have them understandable.

Mr. MANN. If that is the reason the gentleman takes that position I will give him some little information. The language which I have referred to is in the first proviso in the bill, and the department, in reporting upon the bill, says:

Before giving consideration to the questions propounded in your letter I wish to state that the third and last proviso to the bill as it passed the Senate was not upon the bill as it was reported upon by this department to the Senate Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MONDELL. We struck that proviso out.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is right. I thought it referred to the first proviso.

Mr. MONDELL. That is the one that we have stricken out. The bill came to us from the Senate, and it was not very clear to some gentlemen on the Public Lands Committee, so the chairman wrote a letter to the department, in order that we might have their construction of it before we passed it, and the letter from which the gentleman reads construes the act in advance to a certain extent.

Mr. MANN. Yes; and expressly says in the report that nobody knows who would have the preference right in the case I have suggested. They do not make it quite so clear as I do.

Mr. MONDELL. We did not so interpret it.

Mr. MANN. It is there, nevertheless.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. How much land will be affected by the passage of this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. It is difficult to say how much. It is simply a modification of the law that has been on the statute books for many years giving the settler who goes on the public domain a preference right for three months in which to locate his claim in the land office.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman says a preference right for three months. Does the gentleman think it is necessary to give the settler three months?

Mr. MONDELL. That has been held to be necessary ever since we had the homestead law.

Mr. FINLEY. But the gentleman proposes to change it now?

Mr. MONDELL. No; we simply extend it to this class of settlers.

Mr. FINLEY. Does not the gentleman think that a bill of this character involving the public domain should come up and be considered in the House on a call of committees?

Mr. MONDELL. I have never heard anyone in the committee or out of it or on the floor doubt the wisdom of the legislation. The propriety of it is apparent to anybody. It simply brings under the general law this additional class of homestead entrymen. The provision is one so well understood and the propriety of giving this class of settlers the right that all others have is so clear that I do not think anyone has objection to it.

Mr. FINLEY. Does not the gentleman think that all homesteaders should have the same rights?

Mr. MONDELL. That is what this law is for. It is to give this new class of homesteaders the same rights which all other homesteaders have, so that if a man goes and settles on a piece of public land he shall have 90 days within which to file his claim in the local land office, so that some one else who does not go upon the land and put improvements upon it may not be able to go to the land office and file a claim in advance of him.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman thinks the homesteader should have the right to settle on a piece of land without taking the preliminary steps to homestead?

Mr. MONDELL. That is the fundamental principle of the homestead law. It has been in the homestead law from the beginning. As a matter of fact, it was the origin of the homestead law. Originally settlers went upon the land, picked out the piece they wanted and put their families there, and then went off to the land office. The settler does not want somebody to make an entry on the land while his family is there and he is on the way to the land office. Some other man might have a swifter horse than he.

Mr. FINLEY. When was this bill first introduced, in this Congress or the last Congress?

Mr. MONDELL. This bill was introduced some time ago.

Mr. FINLEY. This is the first Congress that the bill has ever been introduced in?

Mr. MONDELL. It could not have been introduced in the last Congress because we have only provided for this class of homesteaders in this Congress.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think this bill ought to be considered in the regular way, on a call of committees, and I object.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from South Carolina withhold his objection for a moment? I just want to ask a question. This enlarged homestead law largely applies to the sand lands in western Nebraska and elsewhere?

Mr. MONDELL. It applies to lands that are so poor that nobody will take them under the ordinary homestead law.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman know whether the Representative from Nebraska, Mr. KINKAID, approves of this legislation?

Mr. MONDELL. The enlarged homestead does not apply to Nebraska at all, because there is a still larger homestead which applies to that State.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from South Carolina will not object to allowing the matter to go over without prejudice, if he has any question in his mind at all.

Mr. FINLEY. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina withdraws his objection, and the gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from South Carolina withdraws his objection entirely——

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from South Carolina withdraws his objection on a condition.

Mr. MONDELL. Very well; I accept that.

Mr. FINLEY. Otherwise I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming, on account of the situation, asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

HOMESTEADERS ON UINTAH INDIAN RESERVATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 6934) to provide an extension of time for the submission of proof by homesteaders on the Uintah Indian Reservation.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who has heretofore made a homestead entry for land which was formerly a part of the Uintah Indian Reservation in the State of Utah, authorized by the act approved May 27, 1902, and acts amendatory thereto, shall, upon application to the register and receiver of the land office in the district in which the land is located, and upon payment of 5 per cent of the price of said land, be allowed an extension of time of one year within which to submit proof on his entry and make payment therefor: Provided, That said 5 per cent shall be accepted as interest for said year, and shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the Indians as a part of the proceeds received for the lands: Provided further, That any entryman may, upon the same conditions, obtain a second extension, and no more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice that this allows anybody who has made a homestead entry prior to the date of the passage of the bill to obtain an extension. Is not this a little unusual to make the bill as broad as that?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I think the bill follows the language of bills of this character that have been passed during this session of Congress. The intention of the bill is to relieve those homesteaders on the Uintah Reservation whose time of making proof is about to mature during the next few months.

Most of the homesteads on this reservation were taken up at the time it was opened for settlement in 1905. These lands were then subject to entry only under the homestead laws with the proviso that the entryman was required at the time of making final proof to pay $1.25 per acre. The preferential right to make a homestead entry was determined by a system of drawing. There was a rush to acquire lands in the beginning, and a great many people found it much more difficult to redeem the soil and bring it under successful cultivation than they expected.

Mr. MANN. If I remember correctly, when this was opened up we provided the land should be paid for all at once.

Mr. HOWELL. All at once, $1.25 an acre.

Mr. MANN. And this money is now coming due?

Mr. HOWELL. The homesteaders who first made entries will be required to make final proof some time this fall.

Mr. MANN. Of course this is to authorize an extension, and anyone who took a homestead entry to-day would authorize an extension probably five years from now.

Mr. HOWELL. That point was considered by the committee, and, inasmuch as the homesteader is required to pay 5 per cent interest on the deferred payment, it was thought that no one would be injured even if some of the later settlers should avail themselves of this provision.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object I desire to interrogate the gentleman for a moment. When this bill was considered in committee I suggested to the gentleman I thought it ought to be amended, and I want to call his attention to the provision in the last Indian appropriation act, which refers to the settlers upon the Uintah Indian Reservation. That provision is very short and reads as follows:

That any person who prior to March 1, 1909, made homestead entry for land in the Uintah Indian Reservation, in the State of Utah, under the act of May 27, 1902, and acts supplementary thereto, and who has not abandoned the same, may make commutation proof therefor, provided such person has fully complied with the provisions of the homestead laws as to improvements and has maintained an actual bona fide residence upon the land for a period of not less than eight months and upon payment thereof of $1.25 per acre: Provided further, That nothing contained herein shall affect any valid adverse claim initiated prior to the passage of this act.

Now, does not the gentleman think that if we pass this bill it ought to conform to that act? Otherwise you are going to have three different laws affecting the homesteaders upon the Uintah Reservation. I apprehend that the persons you are desirous of relieving are those settlers who went in there at the time of the drawing, at the time of the rush, and not the settlers who may go in there to-morrow, because under this bill anyone who makes an entry up to the time the law is approved by the President is granted a special privilege, seven years after that time, of still having two years to pay for his land. Does not the gentleman think it would be better, inasmuch as we have already passed one act—special legislation—authorizing these entrymen to acquire title to their land upon a residence of eight months, whereas the law requires 14, that we ought to limit this act to settlers who filed prior to March, 1909?

Mr. HOWELL. I will say to the gentleman from South Dakota that, under the existing law, lands in the late Uintah Reservation can be acquired without homesteading. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to appraise the land and dispose of it to the highest eligible bidder at or above the appraised value The restriction as to disposing of the lands by homesteads continued for only five years after the lands were thrown open to settlement. In view of this provision for selling the land the paragraph mentioned was inserted in the Indian appropriation bill relaxing the conditions of the homestead law to the entryman.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will ask the gentleman if any lands that have not been disposed of in the Uintah Indian Reservation are now subject to homestead entry?

Mr. HOWELL. Undoubtedly they are. They are also subject to sale under the system of appraisement. After five years, if I remember the law aright, lands not then entered under the provisions of the homestead laws were subject to disposal by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is more as to a question of precedent that I raised the question than to suggest an amendment in this particular case. You are legislating, so far as the Uintah Reservation is concerned, and saying that a man who makes a homestead entry now shall have a privilege which does not exist under the homestead laws, and it is a question of whether or not it is not a bad precedent.

Mr. HOWELL. Of course, this is primarily to relieve the situation of these first hardy settlers, who have battled against obstacles in making homes in that section of the country and whose final proof must be made during the next year or two. From the time these lands became subject to sale by the Secretary of the Interior I hardly believe that but few persons would apply to make a homestead entry. Since 1910 the lands can be purchased at practically the same value as exacted of the homesteader, and for that reason but few, if any, homesteads have been made recently.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Does the gentleman think there have been, as a matter of fact, any homestead entries made since March, 1909?

Mr. HOWELL. I think very few, if any.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman inform us what the climatic conditions are in Utah which make a necessity for extension at this time?

Mr. HOWELL. The Uintah Indian Reservation is an arid region. It is impossible to grow crops there without irrigation. Most of the streams are in deep canyons, and it has required an immense amount of labor and capital to bring the water out and render it available for irrigation. The settlers in that country have devoted themselves to the establishment of homes and the construction of irrigation systems by which to reclaim the country. When irrigated this section is very fertile and is being developed successfully, but it is comparatively unproductive without irrigation. You can not insure the growth of any valuable crop without it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it true that on some of the new lands it is easier to raise crops than on old lands?

Mr. HOWELL. I think that new land would require more water in the first place in order to properly irrigate it than later when the land became thoroughly saturated with water. I think this relief is very much deserved, and anyone who will go through that country and see the obstacles which the settlers have to contend with would freely and cheerfully extend the help asked. It is not at the expense of anyone. It simply means in this new country, where money is scarce and the homesteader is hard up for means, he is able to borrow from the Indian fund at 5 per cent interest, which does no injury.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. About how many families would be affected?

Mr. HOWELL. About 1,800. There have been some 2,300 applications made in the Land Office——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think the bill should become a law. We have frequently granted extensions of time in different parts of the country for the same reason, and I think this bill should pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, insert a new section, as follows:
"SEC. 2. That nothing herein contained shall affect any valid adverse claim initiated prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take the full five minutes on this matter, but I would like to ask the gentleman from Utah what is the purpose of this amendment? It seems to me if you are giving all these people the right of extending their time a year, and paying 5 per cent interest, you ought not to cut that out by this amendment and leave them all standing as they now stand.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the amendment was offered by me in the committee for this purpose: If a man is in default and a contest is brought against his entry, it is not the purpose of this legislation to dispose of that case.

Mr. RAKER. Why not?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Well, I do not think we ought to do it.

Mr. RAKER. If he is in default on the payment, you are extending the time to these other people, and rightfully; and if somebody has slipped in in the night and caused him a contest, it seems to me we ought to give him the same right as anybody else.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There are a great many things that would justify a contest. A contest might be based on the theory of compliance with the law, a matter of residence, and so forth.

Mr. RAKER. As far as payments are concerned this bill would not affect their other rights, but if a man has not paid up——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is practically an extension of the time within which he may make proof.

Mr. MONDELL. Let me suggest to the gentleman from California that in some cases persons might have paid their relinquishments and made entries, and if this provision was not in the bill the original entryman could go in there and demand his.

Mr. RAKER. That would not be anything wrong.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. In all these bills granting extensions and relief to settlers that provision has usually been incorporated as a part of the law.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, insert as a new section the following:
"SEC. 2. That nothing herein contained shall affect any valid adverse claim initiated prior to the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the amended Senate bill.

The Senate bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOWELL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INVESTIGATION INTO THE HIGH PRICE OF ANTHRACITE COAL.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House resolution 578, directing the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to ascertain and report to the House of Representatives certain facts regarding the cost of anthracite coal and the increased demand upon the public consumer.

The resolution was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to make this suggestion to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DIFENDERFER]: First, whether the resolution ought not simply to direct the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to make the investigation, leaving it to him to determine whether all or a part of it should be made through the Bureau of Labor or the Bureau of Corporations; second, whether the gentleman knows whether the Interstate Commerce Commission is now making an investigation of railroad rates on anthracite coal, which, if made, ought to be utilized in connection with any investigation like this, instead of doing it originally again.

Mr. DIFENDERFER. I think the gentleman is perhaps right in that. This resolution was introduced before we had any information on that subject.

Mr. MANN. I ask the gentleman whether he will not ask unanimous consent to pass over this resolution without prejudice until he can ascertain as to that matter? There will be plenty of opportunity for the passage of the resolution before the adjournment of Congress.

Mr. DIFENDERFER. The gentleman means it can come up in two weeks?

Mr. MANN. Yes; it can come up in two weeks, if we are in session at that time, and I am afraid we shall be.

Mr. DIFENDERFER. I am very anxious to have the matter brought up at this session, and I would be very much pleased to incorporate any amendment that the gentleman might suggest.

Mr. MANN. I have not the amendment, and I am not certain just what the amendment should be. I asked the question of the gentleman so that he might understand that it would be advisable to amend his resolution in that regard.

Mr. SABATH. Does not one department, as a rule, secure the information from the other, so if one department initiates such an investigation the other department to which the resolution was referred would inquire of that first department and obtain such information as it had secured by making the investigation?

Mr. MANN. I do not think, as a rule, the department making the investigation would go to the Interstate Commerce Commission for information, although I would not say they would not; but I am inclined to think that in making this investigation gentlemen will remember this: The Commissioner of Corporations has much greater power in making investigations than has the Commissioner of Labor. The Commissioner of Labor is certainly the person to make the investigation of labor costs, but when you want to go further and investigate these corporations you might need the power that the Commissioner of Corporations has, and I apprehend that an investigation of this sort, if it is to be of any value, ought to be very thorough.

Mr. DIFENDERFER. I will suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that Mr. Charles P. Neill assisted in drawing up this resolution.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt of that. I have never heard of one of these resolutions coming in without proper previous consultation with a department. But probably this did not occur to the Commissioner of Labor.

Mr. DIFENDERFER. I will accede to the gentleman's wish, Mr. Speaker, and ask that the resolution be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DIFENDERFER] asks unanimous consent that the consideration of the resolution be passed without prejudice. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we have had a very hot day, and——

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 16, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, requesting an increase in the appropriation for the Butler and Winder Buildings at Washington, D. C. (H. Doc. No. 873), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. PETERS, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12813) to refund duties collected on parts and accessories of lace-making and other machines imported prior to January 1, 1911, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 998), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 22199) to establish a subport of entry and delivery at Port Bolivar, in the State of Texas, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 999), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Labor, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 25305) to regulate the method of directing the work of Government employees, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1001), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. UNDERHILL: A bill (H. R. 25761) defining wine, imitation and carbonated wines; for preventing adulteration, misbranding, and imitation of wines; for imposing a tax upon and regulating the sale of artificial wines; for regulating interstate traffic and foreign trade therein, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BROUSSARD: A bill (H. R. 25762) for the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Baton Rouge, La.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HULL: A bill (H. R. 25763) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska: A bill (H. R. 25764) to subject lands of former Fort Niobrara Military Reservation and other lands to homestead entry; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. LEVY: A bill (H. R. 25765) to amend "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, by placing certain articles on the free list; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: Resolution (H. Res. 631) to print 30,000 copies of Senate Document No. 722, entitled "Equal Suffrage in Colorado"; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. BULKLEY: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 337) requesting the President to cause an investigation of the Patent Office, and make a report with recommendations to Congress; to the Committee on Patents.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin: A bill (H. R. 25766) granting an increase of pension to Mary Daniels; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DICKINSON: A bill (H. R. 25767) granting a pension to Sanford P. Cutler; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. EDWARDS: A bill (H. R. 25768) for the relief of Mrs. R. E. Lucas; to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 25769) for the relief of heirs of Charlton Hines; to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 25770) for the relief of the heirs of H. C. Mehrtens, deceased; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. GOULD: A bill (H. R. 25771) for the relief of James M. McKenney; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KORBLY: A bill (H. R. 25772) for the relief of the heirs of Bernhard Strauss; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. McCALL: A bill (H. R. 25773) granting a pension to Charles McHugh; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. OLMSTED: A bill (H. R. 25774) granting an honorable discharge to Francis Tomlinson; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. POST: A bill (H. R. 25775) granting an increase of pension to William A. Barnes; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. POWERS: A bill (H. R. 25776) for the relief of Sarah Ann Slaven; to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 25777) for the relief of the heirs of Samuel Griffis, deceased; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. STEPHENS of California: A bill (H. R. 25778) to authorize the sale and issuance of patent for certain land to H. W. O'Melveny; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Memorial of Tow Rycewy sw Kazirmina Kroli Society, No. 344, of Chicago, Ill., against passage of bills restricting immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. ASHBROOK: Petition of the American Embassy Association of New York City, favoring passage of House bill 22589, for improvement of consular and diplomatic building; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of R. Reiser and 5 other merchants of Tuscarawas, Ohio, protesting against the enactment of proposed parcel-post legislation; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. BARTHOLDT: Petitions of the Chas. F. Luehrmann Hardwood Lumber Co. and the Antrim Lumber Co., of St. Louis, Mo., that the same privilege be given the shipper to go to court to correct mistakes as is given the carrier; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of the Antikamnia Chemical Co., of St. Louis, Mo., against the Wright bill, imposing a tax upon the production, etc., of habit-forming drugs; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the Workingmen's Sick and Death Benefit Society, Branch No. 71, of St. Louis, Mo., against passage of bills restricting immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. DIFENDERFER: Petition of the Daughters of Liberty of Pennsylvania, and of Wyndmoor Council, No. 770, Order of Independent Americans, favoring passage of House bill 22527, for restriction of immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of the Women's Auxiliary of the Church of the Messiah of Gwynedd, Pa., favoring passage of bill for medical and sanitary relief of the natives of Alaska; to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. FOCHT: Petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, favoring passage of the Berger old-age pension bill, pensioning deserving men and women over 60 years of age; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FORNES: Petition of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, favoring passage of workmen's liability act; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GOLDFOGLE: Memorial of citizens of Chicago, Ill., against passage of bills restricting immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. RAKER: Memorial of the California Club, of California, favoring passage of bill giving the right of franchise to every native-born American woman of the United States, irrespective of the nationality of her husband; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. REILLY: Petition of the National Association of Piano Merchants of America, protesting against any legislation affecting price maintenance; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. SABATH: Memorial of Holy Mother of Lazajs B. Society, No. 179, of Chicago, Ill., against passage of bills restricting immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 16, 1912.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, the bill (S. 4745) to consolidate certain forest lands in the Paulina (Oreg.) National Forest.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, each with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

S. 338. An act authorizing the sale of certain lands in the Colville Indian Reservation to the town of Okanogan, State of Washington, for public-park purposes;

S. 5446. An act relating to partial assignments of desert-land entries within reclamation projects made since March 28, 1908;

S. 6934. An act to provide an extension of time for submission of proof by homesteaders on the Uintah Indian Reservation; and

S. 7002. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant to Salt Lake City, Utah, a right of way over certain public lands for reservoir purposes.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17239) to authorize the Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 4568) granting an increase of pension to Annie R. Schley, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi, and Mr. WOOD of New Jersey managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 4948) to amend an act approved May 27, 1908, entitled "An act for the removal of restrictions from part of the lands of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, Mr. GUDGER, and Mr. BURKE of South Dakota managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 100) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to permit the continuation of coal-mining operations on certain lands in Wyoming, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. MONDELL managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 4012. An act to authorize the exchange of certain lands with the State of Michigan;

H. R. 19339. An act granting public lands to the cities of Boulder and Canon City, in the State of Colorado, for public-park purposes;

H. R. 23293. An act for the protection of the water supply of the city of Colorado Springs and the town of Manitou, Colo.; and

H. R. 23568. An act to amend section 55 of "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to and the bills were postponed indefinitely.

S. 5359. A bill providing for the recognition by the United States Government for the men who served as locomotive engineers during the late Civil War (Rept. No. 922);

S. 1380. A bill to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers, sailors, and marines in the State of Florida (Rept. No. 923); and

S. 3108. A bill for the relief of George W. Philpott (Rept. No. 924).

Mr. CLAPP. From the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 18041) granting franchises for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a street railway system in the district of South Hilo, county of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii, and I submit a report (No. 925) thereon. I desire to state that it has been impossible to get the committee to meet upon this bill, and the clerk advises me that the favorable report is made upon a poll of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask that Order of Business 472, being the bill (H. R. 11628) authorizing John T. McCrosson and associates to construct an irrigation ditch on the Island of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii, be taken from the calendar and rereferred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1562) for the relief of William Walters, alias Joshua Brown, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 926) thereon.

Mr. DU PONT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2518) to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war, reported it with amendments.

Mr. OLIVER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4113) for the relief of Robert E. Burke, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3159) for the relief of John W. Cupp, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. POMERENE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 25598) granting a pension to Cornelia Bragg, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 927) thereon.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 17595) to amend sections 1 and 118 of act of March 3, 1911, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 928) thereon.

JOHN C. SCHOLTZ.

Mr. DU PONT. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 119) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point John C. Scholtz, a citizen of Venezuela, and I submit a report (No. 921) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. I shall not object to the present consideration of this measure, but I shall object to any further unanimous consent being given for the consideration of a bill this morning.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GIBBES LYKES.

Mr. DU PONT. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably with an amendment in the nature of a substitute the bill (S. 6176) for the relief of Gibbes Lykes, and I submit a report (No. 920) thereon.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Delaware.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Gibbes Lykes, late a second lieutenant of Cavalry in the United States Army, to be a second lieutenant of Cavalry in the United States Army, to take rank at the foot of the list of second lieutenants of Cavalry: Provided, That no back pay or allowances shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

PATENT LAWS.

Mr. CULLOM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 6273) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to patents, which was referred to the Committee on Patents and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. WORKS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 23451) to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties, and other claims for damages to and loss of private property, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. CATRON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL (H. R. 25069).

Mr. SWANSON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $80,000 for additional equipment and supplies for the Geological Survey photolithographic plant, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Printing and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FALL submitted an amendment relative to surveying the public lands, intended to be proposed by him to the suudry civil appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MAXIMUM SHIP FOR NAVY.

Mr. TILLMAN. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 361) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be, and it is hereby, instructed to investigate and report to the Senate what is the maximum size of ship, whether battleship or cruiser; the maximum thickness of armor that such ship can safely carry; the maximum size of gun; the maximum speed; and the maximum desirable radius of action of such vessel that can safely be built so as to navigate the ocean and enter the first-class harbors of the world; how much draft can such vessel carry in order to enter the existing dry docks in this country for repairs and safely pass through the Panama Canal, the object being to find out from authentic and reliable official sources the maximum size and maximum draft, the maximum armament, and the maximum thickness of armor to make the very best battleship or cruiser that the world has ever seen or will ever see; to have this country own the greatest marine engine of war ever constructed or ever to be constructed under known conditions; and to report whether one such overpowering vessel would not in its judgment be better for this country to build than to continue by increasing taxation to spend the millions and millions of dollars now in prospect in the race for naval supremacy. Let such vessel be named the "Terror" and become the peacemaker of the world. Let us find out just how far we can go with any degree of safety and go there at once. Let us leave some money in the Treasury for other more necessary and useful expenditures, such as good roads, controlling the floods in the Mississippi, draining swamp land in the South, and irrigating the arid land in the West.

LOYALTY OF CIVIL WAR CLAIMANTS.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD so much of a decision of the Court of Claims as defines the jurisdiction of the court conferred by the fourteenth section of the Tucker Act; also the proclamation of amnesty of December 25, 1868, by the President of the United States, and the two decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States reported in the case of Armstrong v. The United States and Pargoud v. United States in Thirteenth Wallace, at pages 155 and 156, in order to bring before the Senate the question whether the rule adopted by the Committee on Claims of the Senate, namely, "To allow no claim whatever wherein there is any question as to the loyalty of the claimant as determined by the court," and in the enforcement of which rule the committee has excluded from the bill H. R. 19115, and other bills of the same nature, the names of all such claimants for payment in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, made and reported by said court in pursuance to section 14 of the Tucker Act, is not an avoidance by that committee of the provisions of that section as construed by the Court of Claims in said decision, and a denial of the constitutional rights of such claimants as restored and reestablished by said proclamation, subsequently recognized and confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in said decisions.

The following is from the opinion of the Court of Claims in the case of Dowdy, Ex., v. The United States (26 Ct. of Cls., p. 223):

This (the fourteenth) section of the Tucker Act is not an amendment of the Bowman Act, and the jurisdiction conferred by the one is an independent and distinct thing from the jurisdiction conferred by the other. * * *

Under the Tucker Act any bill may be referred, "except for a pension," and there is no other restriction upon the jurisdiction of the court. A claim for the destruction of property by the Army, a claim for the occupation of real estate at the seat of war, a claim barred by a law of Congress, and a claim for quartermaster's stores, where the owner has given aid and comfort to the rebellion, are all within the jurisdiction of the court for the purpose of investigating and reporting the facts, if properly referred under the fourteenth section.

The proclamation of the President of December 25, 1868 (15 Stat., 711), is as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States has heretofore set forth several proclamations, offering amnesty and pardon to persons who have been or were concerned in the late rebellion against the lawful authorities of the Government of the United States, which proclamations were severally issued on the 8th day of December, 1863, on the 26th day of March, 1864, on the 20th day of May, 1865, on the 7th day of September, 1867, and on the 4th day of July in the present year; and

Whereas the authority of the Federal Government having been reestablished in all the States and Territories within the jurisdiction of the United States, it is believed that such prudential reservations and exceptions as at the dates of said several proclamations were deemed necessary and proper may now be wisely and justly relinquished, and that a universal amnesty and pardon for participation in said rebellion, extended to all who have borne any part therein, will tend to secure permanent peace, order, and prosperity throughout the land and to renew and fully restore confidence and fraternal feeling among the whole people and their respect for and attachment to the National Government designed by its patriotic founders for the general good:

Now, therefore be it known that I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, by virtue of the power and authority in me vested by the Constitution, and in the name of the sovereign people of the United States, do hereby proclaim and declare, unconditionally and without reservation to all and to every person who directly or indirectly participated in the late insurrection or rebellion, a full pardon and amnesty for the offense of treason against the United States, or of adhering to their enemies during the late Civil War, with restoration of all rights, privileges, and immunities under the Constitution and the laws which have been made in pursuance thereof.

In testimony whereof I have signed these presents with my hand and have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed.

Done at the city of Washington the 25th day of December, 1868, and of the Independence of the United States of America the ninety-third.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

By the President:
F. W. SEWARD,
Acting Secretary of State.

The opinion of the court in the said case of Armstrong v. The United States is as follows:

The abandoned and captured property act provides for the restoration of the proceeds of property on proof that the claimant has never given any aid or comfort to the present rebellion. The Court of Claims seems to have thought that going South with her slaves was evidence that she did give aid or comfort to the rebellion. On this point it is not now necessary that we express an opinion; for the President of the United States on the 25th of December, 1868, issued a proclamation, reciting that "a universal amnesty and pardon for participation in said rebellion, extended to all who have borne any part therein, will tend to secure permanent peace, order, and prosperity throughout the land, and to renew and fully restore confidence and fraternal feeling among the whole people, and their respect for and attachment to the National Government, designed by its patriotic founders for the general good"; and granting "unconditionally, and without reservation, to all and every person who directly or indirectly participated in the late insurrection or rebellion, a full pardon and amnesty for the offense of treason against the United States, or of adhering to their enemies during the late Civil War, with restoration of all rights, privileges, and immunities under the Constitution and the laws which have been made in pursuance thereof."

We have recently held, in the case of the United States v. Klein, that pardon granted upon condition blots out the offense if proof is made of compliance with the condition; and that the person so pardoned is entitled to the restoration of the proceeds of captured and abandoned property if suits be brought within "two years after the suppression of the rebellion." The proclamation of the 25th of December granted pardon unconditionally and without reservation. This was a public act of which all courts of the United States are bound to take notice, and to which all courts are bound to give effect. The claim of the petitioner was preferred within two years. The Court of Claims therefore erred in not giving the petitioner the benefit of the proclamation.

Its judgment must be reversed with directions to proceed in conformity with this opinion.

The opinion of the court in the said case of Pargoud v. The United States is as follows:

We have recently decided in the case of Armstrong v. The United States that the President's proclamation of December 25, 1868, granting pardon and amnesty unconditionally and without reservation to all who participated, directly or indirectly, in the late rebellion, relieved claimants of captured and abandoned property from proof of adhesion to the United States during the late Civil War. It was unnecessary, therefore, to prove such adhesion or personal pardon for taking part in the rebellion against the United States.

The judgment of the Court of Claims dismissing the petition is reversed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had, on July 16, 1912, approved and signed the following act:

S. 5271. An act to confer concurrent jurisdiction on the police court of the District of Columbia in certain cases.

COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 338) authorizing the sale of certain lands in the Colville Indian Reservation to the town of Okanogan, State of Washington, for public park purposes, which was, on page 1, line 3, to strike out "there is hereby granted and conveyed" and insert "the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to convey."

Mr. PAGE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ASSIGNMENTS OF DESERT-LAND ENTRIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5446) relating to partial assignments of desert-land entries within reclamation projects made since March 28, 1908, which was, on page 2, line 3, to strike out "may" and insert "shall."

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

UINTAH INDIAN RESERVATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6934) to provide an extension of time for submission of proof by homesteaders on the Uintah Indian Reservation, which was, on page 2, after line 5, to insert:

SEC. 2. That nothing herein contained shall affect any valid adverse claim initiated prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND AT SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 7002) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant to Salt Lake City, Utah, a right of way over certain public lands for reservoir purposes, which was, on page 2, line 3, to strike out "Thirty-fifth" and insert "Twenty-fifth."

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

H. R. 4012. An act to authorize the exchange of certain lands with the State of Michigan;

H. R. 19339. An act granting public lands to the cities of Boulder and Canon City, in the State of Colorado, for public-park purposes; and

H. R. 23293. An act for the protection of the water supply of the city of Colorado Springs and the town of Manitou, Colo.

H. R. 23568. An act to amend section 55 of "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Patents.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 92) providing for the purchase of the home of Thomas Jefferson at Monticello, Va.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Iowa kindly permit the Chair to call attention to the message from the House that was laid before the Senate yesterday? The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] desires to make a motion concerning it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the House, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 8, 1912.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to return to the Senate, in compliance with its request, Senate bill 6084, granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House and requested a conference.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I now move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I make the point that there is no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri raises the point that there is no quorum present, and the roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cullom	Jones	Paynter
Bacon	Cummins	Kenyon	Perkins
Bailey	Dillingham	Lodge	Pomerene
Bradley	du Pont	McCumber	Simmons
Brandegee	Fall	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Bristow	Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Stephenson
Bryan	Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Stone
Chamberlain	Gamble	Massey	Thornton
Clapp	Gronna	Myers	Tillman
Clark, Wyo.	Guggenheim	Newlands	Townsend
Clarke, Ark.	Heyburn	O'Gorman	Warren
Crane	Hitchcock	Oliver	Wetmore
Crawford	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Works
Culberson	Johnston, Ala.	Page

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER], and I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, on the 27th of last June I gave notice, at the time I introduced Senate bill No. 7204, that on this morning, immediately after the morning business, I would submit a few remarks in reference to that bill. I now simply desire to inquire has morning business closed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business has closed, but the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] was recognized. He has asked for the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 92. Will the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Iowa for that purpose?

Mr. ASHURST. Very cheerfully.

PURCHASE OF MONTICELLO.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 92) providing for the purchase of the home of Thomas Jefferson at Monticello, Va.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I do not object to the consideration of this joint resolution, but I shall feel constrained to object to any further request of this character, in view of the appropriation bills now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas the Declaration of Independence was a new light and gospel to the downtrodden of the world; and

Whereas through the genius, splendid patriotism, and teachings of Thomas Jefferson, America was started on a career that has brought untold blessings to this country; and believing it most fitting and proper that the home of Thomas Jefferson at Monticello should be the property of the great Nation and country he loved and served so well: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President of the Senate of the United States be, and is hereby, instructed to appoint a committee of five Members of this body, to cooperate with a similar committee to be appointed by the House of Representatives, to inquire into the wisdom and ascertain the price of acquiring said home as the property of the United States, that it may be preserved for all time in its entirety for the American people.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that where the joint resolution reads "the price of acquiring said home" that it should read "the cost of acquiring," and so forth.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is a wise suggestion, and I am quite willing to accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the joint resolution go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho objects.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I suggest to the Senator from Idaho that the joint resolution itself provides only for the appointment of five Senators and five Members of the other House as a committee. I think the Senator must possibly found his objection upon the preamble, which the committee should have stricken and intended to strike out; and I shall be very glad to offer an amendment striking out the preamble.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Iowa has exactly stated my objection. The statement contained in a preamble very often attempts to interpret legislation. A man might be perfectly willing to vote for a joint resolution, but he might not be willing to subscribe to a doctrine stated in the nature of a preamble.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, vote against it.

Mr. HEYBURN. But if the preamble is stricken out, my objection would be withdrawn. I do not subscribe to the preamble.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Idaho does not commit himself to it by withholding the objection and allowing the Senate to vote on the joint resolution. The Senator could vote against it, and I have no doubt would do so, if he objects to any part of the joint resolution.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would not want to be placed in the position of voting against the joint resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator's statement is in the RECORD, and there would be no trouble about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Texas will allow me a moment. The part of the preamble that ought not to be there is the part that commits Congress to the purchase of the estate. That is the very thing to be hereafter determined. Therefore I believe it to be very wise to allow the preamble to be stricken out.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask for the reading of the entire joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will again be read.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I was right in my first impression. It is the preamble that I object to. It recites statements that I do not concur in—that is to say, I would not responsibly concede that Thomas Jefferson wrote the Declaration of Independence or that he was in any way responsible for it. He was merely the secretary of a committee that prepared it.

Mr. BAILEY. He was the chairman of the committee, and it is in his own handwriting.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, I have many things, perhaps with not so much merit, that are in my clerk's handwriting, and yet I would not like to see them attributed to the wisdom of my clerk. We all know the history of the Declaration of Independence. I have a large share of admiration for Thomas Jefferson for what he really did, but I do not think it is necessary to build up any fiction about it. I presume I have had access, and have given study to everything that has been available to any other Member of this body, and I would not detract a word from him; neither would I deify him because of something that he did not do.

I know that he has been set up as the patron saint, when he is convenient, for a great political party, and that whenever they desire to use something on the authority of ancient records, they bring out Thomas Jefferson. He is about as well bronzed and moss covered as any other statesman who could be found. I would not stand here——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment. I would not stand here and detract in the slightest degree from him, first, out of consideration for the feelings of my friends—and I regard every man in the body as my friend whether he regards me as such or not—but I do not desire to be carried away upon the wings of sentiment. I do not desire to enter into a discussion of the merits of Thomas Jefferson. I only protest at this time against stating as an established fact that he is the author of the Government of the United States. He took no part in framing or in making the Government of the United States. He was not even on this continent when the Government of the United States was organized and framed; and, if history is correct, he was not in sympathy at all——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield in a moment. I am not physically able to enter into a controversy this morning.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like very much to yield, but I am not physically able to enter into a controversy. I am, however, able to record my views, and then let them stand for such treatment as Senators may see fit to give them now or later. I merely want to state my views against a declaration on the part of the Senate, which will doubtless be unanimous if it is made at all, that Thomas Jefferson was the founder of this Government or that he was the author of the Constitution of the United States or that he was the author of the Declaration of Independence. There are too many interlineations in the hand of good old Benjamin Franklin in that document to be overlooked. It was the result of the conference of a number of men.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment. I would gladly yield, and would even be pleased to enter into a conservative——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, I would say, if Senators who are seeking to interrupt will pardon me, that I am not physically able this morning to enter into any discussion. It is as much as I can do to state my reasons for asking that the matter go over. At another day, when the question comes up, if it ever does, and I am feeling equal to it, I would be very pleased to discuss this question, but at this time I am merely trying to state for the RECORD the reasons why I interpose this objection, which is well within my rights.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has given notice that this morning he is going to discuss just such rights as I am undertaking to exercise now. I never welcomed the discussion of a question with more hearty accord than I do that which is to be undertaken by the Senator from Texas this morning. It is one that I have lived with and have grieved over for weeks and years.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho object to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I was doing more; I was, with the ordinary privilege of a Senator, stating my objection. I am not going to discuss it at length, but I would ask the permission of the Senate to finish my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho objects to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, does the Senator from Idaho object to a word being said on the subject? I merely want to say one word.

Mr. HEYBURN. I can not understand——

Mr. BACON. I do not propose to engage the Senator in any discussion.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, if the Senator will be just as patient as he can——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Unless the Chair takes me off the floor, I shall object to being taken off by another Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will not yield, unless the Chair takes me off the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Idaho has not the floor; he does not hold it except through the courtesy of the Senator from Arizona. I yielded to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] with the understanding that the matter which he desired to present would lead to no discussion, and he yielded to the Senator from Idaho, but I very cheerfully yield to the distinguished Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not desire to occupy the floor under any such conditions. The joint resolution came up, and the question was whether or not there was objection, and I raised the objection. I am not on the floor by the grace of any other Senator; I am here by the courtesy of the Presiding Officer, with the right of the Senate always to direct the course of the Presiding Officer, and without any intention of going at length into the question. I desire that there shall be no mistake to be gathered from the RECORD hereafter as to the nature of my objection. I am glad to have had the opportunity to have been able to reenter the Senate just as this question came up; and I am confining myself merely to stating the grounds of my objection in order that I may not be charged with churlishness or sectionalism or partisanship. You can charge a good bit of it—the last part of it—to partisanship, because I am a partisan politician, but I never feel called on to apologize for that. I think the man who does feel called on to apologize for it should apologize for being in public life at all.

Now, Mr. President, that is the extent of my objection. I asked that the joint resolution go over, in order that I might state those reasons. Having stated them, I will now withdraw my objection and let the Senate do as it pleases with the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I have no objection to the consideration of the joint resolution, of course, but I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that while this is a joint resolution, it proposes to appoint a committee of the Senate alone. I make this inquiry——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is not my resolution; it is a resolution reported by the Committee on the Library, and I do not feel authorized to change it in that respect.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I offered that joint resolution, Mr. President, and I am willing to change it in any way that may be necessary to make it effective. I regret that the distinguished Senator from Idaho can not indorse the preamble. God knows I can not see anything in the preamble that should harm the Senate or any individual; and I am vain enough to believe, in view of the unfortunate physical condition of the Senator from Idaho, that if he would just gushingly and willingly vote for that preamble it would restore him to better health. I have no purpose of infusing or injecting any politics into it at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was unable to understand the remarks of the Senator in connection with my name, because——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I thought I spoke loud enough. The Senator referred to the fact that he was not feeling well, and I simply said that I believed anyone voting for the joint resolution, with the sentiments embodied in the preamble, would advance his well-being.

I had no thought in introducing the joint resolution with reference to Democracy. I merely took into consideration the fact that Thomas Jefferson was the author of the Declaration of Independence and that he is believed to be by the masses of the people of the United States one of its great sons. I am quite anxious to do him honor and at the same time give the people the benefit of his home as a shrine.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I feel we are violating the arrangement under which I asked for the consent, and I therefore withdraw it rather than to provoke any further discussion.

DESERT-LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, a sense of duty and propriety as well impel me to be very brief, and I shall be, in submitting the few remarks that I shall make. I ask the Secretary to read for the information of the Senate the bill (S. 7204) to exempt from cancellation and provide for patenting of desert-land entries reclaimed by dry-farming process.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no desert-land entry heretofore made under the public-land laws, for lands, shall be canceled or in any wise impaired because of any failure on the part of the entryman to make any annual or final proof falling due upon any such entry prior to December 31, 1913: Provided, however, That patent shall be permitted to issue to any desert-land entry when the proofs disclose that the land embraced within such entry has fairly and in good faith been reclaimed to agricultural or horticultural crops by the dry-farming process.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it will be observed that this bill, if enacted into a law, will enable those settlers who have made desert entries to procure patent when they shall have in good faith reclaimed to agricultural or horticultural crops the land embraced within their entry.

There exists no substantial reason why this bill should not become a law. The object of the law authorizing desert entries is the reclamation of the land. For all practical purposes it should be of no concern as to the particular manner in which lands are reclaimed, so long as they actually be reclaimed. It is unfair to subject the desert entryman to a Procrustean bed of fixity, and in effect to tell him, as the present law does, that, no matter what success he may achieve, no matter how bountiful be the crops he may grow upon his land by dry-farming or other process, he may obtain title by reclaiming the lands by irrigation only.

The character of the land always varies, and the home builder should be afforded every reasonable opportunity to have the advantage of the variations. Some tracts of land are susceptible of reclamation by irrigation only, and of course the reverse is true respecting different lands.

Irrigation was practiced by the early people on the banks of the Nile, the Tigris, and the Euphrates. Irrigation was also practiced by the aborigines of South America before and at the time of the Spanish conquests.

Numerous places in Arizona bear indisputable evidence of the fact that the skillful engineers of ancient Arizona watered its fertile fields from concrete-lined aqueducts and giant irrigation dams centuries before Montezuma ascended the throne of the Aztecs.

But irrigation in the present age upon the North American Continent dates from the settlement on the Jordan River in Utah by those heroic pioneers, the Mormons.

The early irrigation enterprises consisted of damming the rivers and streams, conveying their waters by ditches and laterals, and distributing it over the land. This method gave rise to water rights and vested interests in the use of the water. In the old and established communities such rights have become very valuable. Later storage dams were constructed, and irrigation in some places has become more and more complex and expensive.

The Government is now, with eminent success, reclaiming vast tracts by constructing immense projects, and the lands under cultivation have become extremely valuable and the field for irrigation greatly enlarged.

It will thus be observed that irrigation is the most ancient and the most feasible method of reclaiming land, but it is not the exclusive method, for many tracts of land may be reclaimed by dry farming only.

Dry farming may be defined to mean the conservation and economical use in farming of a scant rainfall which is variable in point of time.

DRY FARMING.

The production of crops without irrigation in regions having a limited rainfall is called arid or dry farming. As a rule, where dry farming is practiced the annual rainfall ranges from about 8 to 20 inches. There are vast semiarid areas in the West which can not be brought under irrigation, and this method of farming is an attempt to utilize some of these lands for other agricultural purposes than mere grazing.

Farming without irrigation was practiced in numerous localities by the early settlers, and while in many cases these efforts were successful in many more they were failures. They demonstrated, however, that under certain conditions dry-land agriculture may be successfully practiced. The experience gained during the last 30 or 40 years and the results of the recent work in this connection carried on by several experiment stations and other agencies indicate that by means of special methods of cultivation, requiring in some instances special tools and implements, and by the use of drought-resistant crops and varieties arid farming may be placed on a much safer basis than heretofore. The fact should not be disregarded, however, that under semiarid conditions without irrigation crop failures are bound to be much more frequent than in regions of adequate rainfall, and it is generally conceded that in order to establish a permanent home on the dry lands of the western plains provision should be made for the irrigation of a small area on which vegetable food for the family and forage for the stock may be grown with certainty every year to tide over the seasons of possible failures on the unirrigated portion of the farm. (Farmers' Bulletin 262, p. 15.)

Last September I attended the agricultural and horticultural fair held in Willcox, in Cochise County, Ariz., where were exhibited products that were raised by dry farming in the Sulphur Springs Valley, and the exhibits there were sufficient to convince the most skeptical that dry farming may be made a success in that valley.

I ask permission at this point to incorporate into the RECORD as a part of my remarks an article by Prof. R. H. Forbes, who has for the past 12 years been superintendent of the agricultural experiment station at the University of Arizona.

The article referred to is as follows:

DRY FARMING IN SULPHUR SPRINGS VALLEY.

The first essential step in dry farming operations is to plow the ground deeply in order that the soil surface may be made receptive to rainfall. In many localities it is necessary for best results to subsoil to a depth of as much as 30 inches in order to break up the hard layer of soil often to be found beneath the surface in this region. With the soil thus prepared, the rainfall will sink rapidly to a depth of from a few inches to a few feet, according to its amount.

The second important thing is to prevent the evaporation of this rainfall after it has been received into the soil. This is accomplished by cultivating the surface of dry-farmed fields after each rain. The mulch of pulverized soil thus maintained on the field acts as a protecting blanket, which prevents the moisture from the deeper inches or feet of soil from evaporating at the surface.

A third important matter is the selection of crops which are especially suitable to our climatic conditions and to dry-farming methods of agriculture. There are many crop plants, such as milo, maize, kafir corn, sorghum, native varieties of maize and beans, together with such vegetable crops as melons and squashes, which do well under our climatic conditions. These crops, at the proper time of year, are planted down to soil moisture and then covered deeply with the surface mulch. The young plants will come up through a surprising depth of this mulch—as much as 6 or 8 inches in the case of corn—and if the ground-water supply is sufficient, and especially if the summer rains are favorable, a crop thus started may be brought to maturity.

Looking to the future of dry farming in Sulphur Springs Valley, it might be well to call attention to the fact that the French in North Africa are at present growing crops of corn, wheat, the vine, grasses, sorghum, and olives on lands receiving from 10 to 16 inches of rainfall per annum. The French employ thorough cultural methods and are especially skillful in the choice of varieties of crop plants suited to semiarid conditions. Recent crop statistics from Algeria state that the average yield of wheat thus grown is 10 bushels per acre; of wine, 1,000 gallons; and of corn, 8 bushels per acre.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may include in the RECORD, as an appendix and as a part of my remarks, a few data on dry farming prepared by the head of the dry-farming bureau of the Brazilian Government at Rio Janeiro; also a communication on this same subject addressed to me by Mr. Malcolm A. Fraser, secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of Prescott, Ariz. I ask permission further at this point to include in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, as an appendix thereto, a portion of the report, No. 413, made by the House Committee on Public Lands relating to the three-year homestead law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the matter referred to will be inserted as an appendix.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have now said all I wish to say directly upon this bill, but with the kind permission of the Senate, I desire to submit some observations upon the present policy obtaining in Washington, which unfortunately has been adopted respecting the pioneers, producers, and home builders of the West; in other words, I embrace this opportunity not only to protest against some of the harsh, narrow, and in many instances unfair ways in which the land laws have been enforced, but to do my full duty toward pointing out that Congress has been remiss in enacting progressive laws necessary to keep abreast with the times.

Mr. President, much of the trouble has arisen because the departments are trying to execute these harsh laws as they find them. It is the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to enforce the law as he finds it written. It would be grossly unjust to lay upon the honorable Secretary of the Interior or the Forestry Department all the blame, or even a large part of the blame, for the evil results flowing from the present reactionary policy that is being pursued toward the West. The blame lies upon Congress, and any relief to be obtained must be obtained by legislation instead of by administration. I am, however, wholly and totally at variance with the present practice which, to my astonishment, I find exists here and permits the head of a department to give his opinion as to what should or what should not be the law. Departments when called upon for reports and for facts should state facts, not conclusions.

Congress should not permit the mere ipse dixit of a department to defeat wholesome laws.

It is the duty of the National Legislature to make the laws, and the House of Representatives with over 400 Members, and the Senate with 96 Senators, representing every State, are presumed to be and, in fact, are more thoroughly conversant with the needs and requirements of the country than any departmental clerk, bureau chief, or department in Washington. And I believe the relief, if any is to come, must be obtained not through the departments, but through that coordinate branch of the Government to which is delegated by the Constitution the power of making laws—the Congress.

Mr. James Bryce, the British ambassador, profound student of political and national economics, eminent publisher and author of that monumental work, The American Commonwealth, published first in 1888, in a certain chapter of his great book spoke of the temper of the West as follows:

Western America is one of the most interesting subjects of study the modern world has seen. There has been nothing in the past resembling its growth and probably there will be nothing in the future. A vast territory, wonderfully rich in natural resources of many kinds; a temperate and healthy climate * * * a soil generally and in many places marvelously fertile; in some regions mountains full of minerals, in others trackless forests where every tree is over 200 feet high; and the whole of this virtually unoccupied territory thrown open to a vigorous race, with all the appliances and contrivances of modern science at its command—these are phenomena absolutely without precedent in history and which can not recur elsewhere, because our planet contains no such other favored tract of country. * * *

The details of this development and the statistics that illustrate it have been too often set forth to need restatement here. It is of the character and the temper of the people who have conducted it that I wish to speak, a matter which has received less attention, but is essential to a just conception of the Americans of to-day. For the West is the most American part of America; that is to say, the part where those features which distinguish America from Europe come out in the strongest relief. What Europe is to Asia, what England is to the rest of Europe, what America is to England, that the Western States are to the Atlantic States. * * * It is the most enterprising and unsettled Americans that come West; and when they have left their old haunts, broken their old ties, resigned the comfort and pleasure of their former homes, they are resolved to obtain the wealth and success for which they have come. They throw themselves into the work with a feverish yet sustained intensity. They rise early, they work all day, they have few pleasures, few opportunities for relaxation. All the passionate eagerness, all the strenuous effort of the Westerners is directed toward the material development of the country. To open the greatest number of mines and extract the greatest quantity of ore, to scatter cattle over a thousand hills, to turn the flower-spangled prairies into wheat fields, to cover the sunny slopes of the Southwest with vines and olives—this is the end and aim of their lives. * * * The passion is so absorbing and so covers the horizon of public as well as private life that it ceases to be selfish, it takes from its very vastness a tinge of ideality. To have an immense production of exchangeable commodities, to force from nature the most she can be made to yield and send it East and West by the cheapest routes to the dearest markets, making one's city a center of trade and raising the price of its real estate—this, which might not have seemed a glorious consummation to Isaiah or Plato, is preached by western newspapers as a kind of religion. It is not really, or at least it is not wholly, sordid. These people are intoxicated by the majestic scale of the nature in which their lot is cast, enormous mineral deposits, boundless prairies, forests which * * * will supply timber to the United States for centuries; a soil which, with the rudest cultivation, yields the most abundant crops, a populous continent for their market.

But now, in 1912, all is changed. That the temper of the people of the West is still the same is quite true. They are still the same brave, resolute, virtuous, liberty-loving, and God-obeying people. The western climate still possesses its salubrity, and the western soil is yet fertile. The mountains and canyons are, as in the days of '49, rich in minerals, but a policy of retrogression and stagnation has been adopted at this Capitol, a policy which declares that money—metals—are of more value to mankind hidden away in the earth than they are when circulating in the channels of trade; a policy which declares that Government land is "wasted" when the settler goes out upon the almost measureless immensity of the desert and by the sweat of his face and by incessant toil causes two orange trees to grow where one giant cactus grew before; a policy so reactionary that in effect it declares that iron is of more utility hidden in the earth than when used for structural purposes or for rails over which to transport the commerce of the Nation; a policy so reactionary that it withdraws all coal and oil lands from entry, thereby allowing the Government to become an accessory before the fact in assisting the Coal Trust and the Oil Trust to retain their crushing and devastating monopoly; a policy so reactionary that in effect it declares that lead and tin, copper, manganese, and other metals are more valuable to the family of men if kept securely in the vaults where primordial chaos locked them than if brought by sturdy miners to earth's surface and used in constructing the mechanical contrivances and ingenious electrical appliances which civilization now demands; a policy which in effect declares that native grasses are "conserved" when permitted to dissipate their nutrition in earth and in air, but are "wasted" when eaten by cattle whose flesh gives food and whose hide furnishes leather for man's use, or by sheep whose flesh gives food and whose wool gives warmth to mankind.

It is proper at this juncture to inquire what are the injustices that are being committed by these policies now in vogue in Washington, and it is pertinent further to inquire what are these abuses?

The recent very able and exhaustive debate, especially the speech of the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], upon the three-year homestead law, relieves me from the necessity of pointing out at length or in any great detail the iniquity of the "red tape" and "house that Jack built" methods of the department, against which I now inveigh.

The distinguished Senator from Montana, Mr. Carter, a statesman of vast experience, whose memory the West honors, speaking in the Senate on the 30th of January, 1907, and pointing out the hardships to which these departmental rulings subjected the settlers, said inter alia respecting the difficulties which attended the homesteader in attempting to secure title to the land embraced within his entry:

> In actual practice the register and receiver of the local land office deliver to the claimant a final receipt on submission of the required proof and the payment of the statutory fees. The land thereupon becomes subject to taxation and the receipt is held by the State courts sufficient evidence of legal title to sustain an action of ejectment. The final receipt, held by the courts and always regarded heretofore as the equivalent of the patent, soon to follow from Washington, is accepted joyously by the man through whose patience, industry, and self-sacrifice it has been won. The family is now secure in its well-earned home, and the future looks brighter and better. The credit formerly withheld will now be extended to enable the struggling toiler to buy a few cattle or other needed stock to make the farm more profitable and the labor less exacting. The good wife and children may now hope to enjoy a few of the long-deferred comforts of life so much needed in and about their humble home.
> The accumulated capital of years of patient endeavor is made available to meet any pressing needs of long standing. The sod roof on the log cabin will soon give way to shingles, and the oldest boy or girl may go away to school. But now, under the order of the honorable Secretary of the Interior, all is changed. The claimant and his two witnesses are now a trio suspected of perjury, and under that suspicion they must rest until some special agent finds time to relieve them at the expense of the Federal Government. When the relief may come no one can tell. That it will be tardy experience demonstrates, for the pernicious practice has been indulged to a considerable extent for some time. In certain cases, I am informed, the poor settlers have been held in painful suspense for years after final proof, either awaiting arrival of the special agent or waiting to hear from his report. Just picture to yourself the settler and his family on the lonely prairie or in the mountain glen. For years he has toiled and struggled to maintain himself and those dependent upon him. On the average he has been in debt every day of that time and, his credit being poor, the interest rate has been high. The land, fairly earned, is his only capital. In support of his right to a patent he produces proof sufficient to sustain a conviction of murder in the first degree. In the face of all this his right under the law is denied him, and he is sent home from the land office, with his witnesses, suspected of felony and commanded to await the coming of a special agent or an officer of the Interior Department to clear up the suspicion.
> Waiving denial of the title their toil has fairly won, who can measure the pain these suspected men are doomed to suffer through the "chastity of honor which feels a stain like a wound?" An implied charge of perjury has been fixed where a badge of honor should have been attached. To all this the torture of suspense is added, for the discredited homesteader has a long period of anxious waiting in store for him. He can not stock the farm, because he has no basis of credit. He dare not make additional improvements, because the special agent may report against him or the land be lost on a technicality. He can only wait, and I understand that some have now been waiting for four years or more. The pathetic victims of this iniquitous policy could not appeal in vain for sympathy to the bowels of a brute.
> We are tardy in demanding to know what overwhelming public necessity cries out for the immolation of so many thousands of innocent victims on the altar of suspicion. The Congress and the country should know. Congress does not intend that its laws shall be executed in a spirit of cruelty or wrath, and the American people, inherently fair and just, need only be informed in order that the potent force of enlightened public opinion may be extended to stay the hand of injustice and oppression.

Mr. President, virtue and patriotism are not confined to congresses and to cabinets. There is not in all this world, nor in the broad extended wings of imagination a subject of thought more ennobling, or a subject of speech more inspiring, than the man who follows the plow, or the man who wields the miner's pick in the hope of achieving fortune, not from tariff exactions or special favors but from the bounty of nature.

The pioneer does not seek wealth or power by hasty ways or fraudulent means, but he patiently waits and resolutely works through dull delays of slow and laborious but sure advancement. The homesteader, in a vast majority of cases, is a man of family; he realizes that the family, not the individual, is the basic constituent element of a country's strength. With a conscience as clear as a cube of sunshine, after a day of useful labor, he finds that sleep which "knits up the raveled sleeve of care" and is, therefore, again at work before the aurora gilds the morning. He is the strength of the State. "He constitutes the State." He bears up against untold difficulties and labors for a subsistence for himself and his family with an industry and a gameness which prove him to be the possessor of the choicest gifts that are bestowed upon the children of men, for he shows by his silent but all-conquering courage that he is of the haughtiest and most aspiring of mankind. The pioneer sometimes lacks that wealth of speech which is heard in the fever of the forum, but "every word he utters weighs a ton, because there is a man behind it." He is familiar with his country's history—with the eye of faith he sees her glorious destiny. He is familiar with the rocks, with seasons that bring variety; familiar with the trees and with the soil.

Mr. President, throughout the land orators, philosophers, poets, authors, and many who sit in academic chairs, are advising the people "to get back to the soil." Nearly every publication contains an article giving wholesome advice as to "how to keep the boys on the farm," and, indeed, it can not be doubted that this advice is timely. The "back to the soil" movement is one of the worthiest movements of the day. History has shown that in troublous times those who have come from the soil have been foremost in defending liberty, for the spirit of the soil is the spirit of freedom, of justice, of purity, and of incarnate honesty.

Permit me at this point to quote those splendid lines recently written by Miss Katharine Turney entitled the "Song of the Soil:"

> I am the Mother of men that toil,
> The ancient Mother of all—the soil.
> The strength that ye boast ye have drawn from my breast,
> 'Tis to my arms that ye creep when ye go for your rest;
> The man to his Mother full tribute shall bring,
> Then hush ye and harken the song that I sing.
> I hold in my great heart the seed and root.
> I give to my children the blossom and fruit;
> In my veins lie the silver, the copper, the gold;
> I bleed, yea I bleed, yet I nothing withhold;
> I smile when thy blade rends my bosom in twain,
> And cover my wounds with a mantle of grain.
> I give ye the bread that ye lift to your lips,
> I feed your proud mills and your far-sailing ships;
> I am loved of the sun and the wind and the rain;
> Then hush ye, my children, no longer complain;
> To each shall be given the guerdon of toil,
> For I am the Mother of Men—the soil.

The stubborn fact, however, is that while all these deep thinkers, sweet singers, powerful orators, and persuasive authors have been advising the people to "get next to the soil" a policy has been pursued in Washington which almost precludes the possibility of getting next to the soil, a policy which, to say the least, renders the life of the homesteader and home builder in the West one of isolation, a policy which requires the overcoming of so many almost insurmountable difficulties that even the boldest and most resolute men and women are shaken when contemplating the difficulties they must encounter before they may receive a patent for this soil, of which we talk so much but really cultivate so little.

Let us, therefore, do our part. The delays incident to acquiring patent to a desert-land entry or a mining claim are interminable. This should not be. Let the Government proceed upon up-to-date business principles and discard the methods that savor so much of Jarndyce versus Jarndyce.

If any great business house—Marshall Field & Co., for example—should attempt for one year to do business according to governmental methods, bankruptcy and ruin would follow that firm. Is this Government to become known as "Uncle Sam, the irresolute"? What a sickening pity to reflect that this Government loses or wastes $1,000,000 every day through indecision and circumlocution!

We hear very much about the necessity of conserving our natural resources, and, indeed, he "would be fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils" who would have the Nation waste its natural resources. The conservation of our forests should indeed be given attention, and he who would ruthlessly and wastefully or needlessly lay low one of the green-plumed monarchs of the forest would be "baser than a bondman"; but the policy of conservation of resources should not go so far as to preclude their honest and necessary use by the people. The policy of precluding the people from taking dead timber from the forests unless the settler runs the gauntlet of the departmental methods of taking out permits is a fruitful source of annoyance to the homesteaders and pioneers; and I do not forget that the bold barons who wrung from King John at Runnymede in 1215 the great charter of English liberty took care to see to it that the forests should be preserved for the use of all the people instead of the use of the aristocracy, and they used the following significant language in articles 47 and 48 of the Magna Charta:

47. All forests that have been made forests in our time shall forthwith be deforested; and the same shall be done with the water banks that have been fenced in by us in our time.

48. All evil customs concerning forests, warrens, foresters and warreners, sheriffs and their officers, water banks and their keepers shall forthwith be inquired into in each county.

I have always been in favor of the protection of the forests, and I am ready now to vote to appropriate such sums of money as are necessary to protect the forests from fire, but reproach is being brought upon conservation by the wholesale and unnecessary withdrawals from settlement and sale of public lands.

Under the present policy, while we may be conserving some of the Nation's resources, we are wasting the people. We are conserving trees, but wasting men. We should not conserve land for itself, nor a tree just because it is a tree, but because the land and tree are useful to man. The end to be achieved in conservation is not the land itself, for itself, but the prevention of unlawful waste in order that man may use the things conserved. We are all aware that there is a Nation-wide rise in the cost of living. While I believe the high protective tariff to be the pregnant parent of the present high cost of living, there are other contributing causes, and one of the chief contributing causes is the fact that the Congress has not enacted laws that give encouragement to those who are engaged in agriculture. There exists in this Nation to-day an unhealthy and unwise economic situation. There are many crowded cities where the condition of the poorer classes of the people is so pitiable that their lives are one fierce struggle for bread. The era of great cities is at hand, and something must be done, and speedily done, to bring relief. Surely to assist in advancing a remedy is a cause worthy of our close attention and our ardent support.

If the people of this Nation be encouraged and be given every legitimate and practicable opportunity for getting next to the soil, we will soon discover that millions of unplowed acres in Arizona, Washington, California, Idaho, Nevada, Oregon, New Mexico, Colorado, Montana, and Wyoming will some day be turned into farms and fields of waving grain and thus afford an opportunity for the absorption of some of the congested situations in our great cities. If home building be encouraged, thousands of our citizens to whom life is now nothing but one ceaseless, remorseless grind for the barest necessaries of life will have an opportunity to enjoy some of the blessings of independence and to get from under the landlordism of another.

I desire at this juncture to read a short article from a Canadian paper, the Calgary Albertan, which I have just clipped and which states that the Dominion immigration agent is very sanguine in his belief that the immigration from the United States for this year will reach 170,000 persons. The article referred to is as follows:

On the same day that the Dominion immigration agent was giving reasons for his belief that the immigration from the United States for the year would reach 170,000, which is much greater than in any previous year, representatives of the most promising States in the Union were making arrangements for a convention to arrange some sort of plan to prevent the migration to our western Provinces.

American settlers will continue to desire to come here under present conditions. They are attracted by our cheap and fertile lands. They are not the kind of people who will permit any person in authority or not in authority to tell them where they are to go and where they are to stay.

The campaign will have no effect other than to advertise the worth and charm and attraction of western Canada among the people who are most desirable as prospective Canadians. Every word that these gentlemen say about the exodus is a word said in favor of the place to which the migration is tending. There is a reason for the exodus. Western Canada is giving an excellent bargain to incoming settlers. The visitor is wise who takes advantage of it.

I ask Senators to observe especially these significant words: "American settlers will continue to desire to come here," to Canada. "They are attracted by our cheap and fertile lands."

Mr. President, the Dominion may boast of its cheap lands, but in many portions of the great State of Arizona, which I have the honor in part to represent, the land is so fertile that if it were not for the prohibitively high freight rates we could ship Arizona soil into Canada for fertilizing purposes. If you be seeking fertile land, turn your attention to our own great States in the West, where citrous fruits fill the air with the fragrance of their blooms even in winter—

Where the olives grow;
The land where the fragrant winds blow
Blue bubbles of grapes down a vineyard row.

If this Congress should pass the bill I have already introduced, which provides for opening the Colorado River Indian Reservation to public settlement, and should this Government then go further and lend its assistance to the construction of an irrigation project there, or if the State of Arizona should, as it probably will, under the Carey Act, construct an irrigation project there, such action would open to settlement 150,000 acres of the richest soil on which the sun ever shone, a soil so fertile that the wildest hyperbole becomes impotent and prosaic in attempting to describe it.

In my judgment, it is not the fertility of the soil that is attracting our Americans to Canada; but there is another line in this clipping which gives the reason why western Canada is attracting our Americans, and I will read that line, which is as follows:

There is a reason for the exodus. Western Canada is giving excellent bargains to incoming settlers.

Thus we find the situation to be that western Canada, with land by no means possessing the fertility of our land, is being settled because excellent bargains are offered to the people, but there is still another significant line in this clipping which I desire to read and which is the real reason why there is stagnation in the western part of the United States but prosperity and vigor in the western part of Canada. This clipping, speaking of the kind of people who are going into Canada, says:

They are not the kind of people who will permit any person in authority or not in authority to tell them where they are to go and where they are to stay.

That is true. The frontiersman, the pioneer, the true American will not for a moment permit a beaurocrat or a doctrinaire sitting at a desk in Washington or elsewhere to tell him where to go and where not to go, and rather than submit to this unjust, un-American harassment and vexation he will resign his citizenship under the banner of the Stars and Stripes and seek a more congenial environment under the Union Jack. To the true American the lands within the State are the lands of his father's house; he will break through red tape; he will be impatient when syllabub instead of statesmanship is applied to public questions.

Let us therefore manfully face the situation as it is; let us cease blaming those who are not responsible. Congress alone is responsible. If these departments and bureaus are circumlocution offices Congress is to blame.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will my colleague pardon an interruption?

Mr. ASHURST. Very cheerfully.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not think that the animadversion cast on Congress in the matter of which my colleague now speaks is entirely due to Congress itself. In quite a long experience in the other House I found the practice growing up that Congress instead of getting the facts from the departments when necessary and legislating in the light of them began to legislate through bureaus, until it has become the custom of the Senate to-day in the committees on which I am serving to ask the advice of the departments. The first question which comes from the chairman of a committee here when a bill comes up is, What has the department advised about this measure? If instead of this course we had been getting only the facts from the department itself, and then Congress had used its judgment in these matters, we would have avoided much that my colleague now very justly criticizes. The sooner we break up the practice and let it be a Government of laws by congressional enactment instead of through the advice of a bureau of the Government, the better it will be not only for us but for the balance of the United States. That Congress is rapidly surrendering its legitimate function to the executive branch of the Government is a lamentable fact, and if persisted in will in yet a short time prove the most dangerous, as it is the most insidious, assault on the guaranties contained in the Federal Constitution limiting within their proper scope the three great powers of government.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank my distinguished colleague. I am very glad to have what he has stated here made as a contribution to my address, because I regard his interruption as the most meritorious part thereof.

Mr. President, if no public business may be transacted in the departments except through endless sinuosities and the unwinding of tangled red tape Congress alone is to blame. I have sufficient faith in the integrity and patriotism of the Secretary of the Interior and the forestry officials to believe that they will scrupulously administer any law we may enact.

With Congress and with Congress alone lies the power, the authority, and the jurisdiction to remedy the situation by enacting fair, reasonable, practical, progressive laws. And then, but not until then, will we reach to a counterpart of the days depicted by Lord Macaulay's balanced lines:

Then none was for a party,
Then all were for the State;
Then the great man helped the poor,
And the poor man loved the great;
Then lands were fairly portioned;
Then spoils were fairly sold;
The Romans were like brothers
In the brave days of old.

I thank the Senate for its attention.

APPENDIX A.

PRESCOTT, ARIZ., June 24, 1912.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senator from Arizona, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR ASHURST: Northern Arizona contains upward of 1,000 dry farmers who, in spite of limited experience, have been able to make a living in this department of the agricultural industry.

Dr. Cooke, who is now head of the dry farming bureau of the Brazilian Government, at Rio de Janeiro, was the first expert to look over the possibilities of this county. His report in a facsimile letter is attached hereunto.

Dr. W. E. Taylor, one of the world's foremost experts on the subject of soil culture, visited Prescott at my request last October. I took him over such parts of our county as must be farmed dry, owing to lack of auxiliary water, and showed him crops which had then been harvested by farmers in different sections of the county. He pronounced the quality of these products equal to the best he had ever seen, and marveled at the depth and richness of the soil.

Since the visits of these two men, great interest has been manifested in dry farming in northern Arizona. I speak particularly of Yavapai County, because my experience lies within its borders, but I am informed that Coconino, Navajo, and Apache Counties contain great areas of land as fertile and with equally deep soils as Yavapai. In Coconino County potatoes raised by scientific farming, without irrigation, can not be surpassed in the world. In the other counties mentioned fine corn, Milo maize, Kaffir corn, sorgum, and potato crops are raised yearly.

Most of the grains and cereals raised by dry-farming methods in northern Arizona are fed to stock, and the market price of these commodities is high. Farmers get 2 cents a pound for corn, Milo maize, and potatoes.

At the rate entries are being made nearly all available acreages in Lonesome, Big Chino, Williamson, Thompson, and Peeples Valleys will be filed upon within the next 10 years.

Of these valleys the most promising is the Big Chino, 50 per cent of which is owned by the Santa Fe Railroad. It is probable, however, that in this valley the chief watersheds will be utilized as dam sites, and, if so, 70,000 acres will ultimately go under irrigation. Along the main line of the Santa Fe dry farming is practiced successfully from Seligman east to the New Mexican line.

Rainfall in northern Arizona, I would say, averages about 18 inches for the last 20 years, and as dry farming is successfully carried on in parts of Wyoming and Idaho with 5 inches less of rainfall, experts agree that our chances are better. Certainly our soils are not inferior to those of any other dry-farming section in the United States; we have enough warm weather to mature crops, and water is available nearly everywhere for domestic and stock purposes. Wells have been dug in Lonesome and Big Chino Valleys and water obtained at from depths of 35 to 400 feet, and I have yet to hear of a case where water has not been found. In the Big Chino Valley several settlers, whom we have located near the valley, state within the last six months that they have found water at depths of from 14 to 60 feet, and along the Big Chino wash, where there seems to be an underflow, it is probable fodder crops can be irrigated on limited acreages.

At the Fifth International Dry Farming Congress, held in Colorado Springs last October, this county had 30 exhibits of root crops, cereals, and deciduous fruits, all raised without irrigation. We entered 26 exhibits and took 24 prizes out of the 26, this being the banner show for any country in the world besides Colorado. Had we exhibited for all Arizona, instead of Yavapai County, as we propose to do this year, I firmly believe we would have beaten Oklahoma and Colorado. The exhibits were collected within 10 days, and no opportunity was given for careful selection. The whole collection was made within a radius of 25 miles of Prescott. This showing was commented upon by the Colorado papers and by the agricultural periodicals of the country.

Very respectfully, yours,

MALCOLM A. FRASER,
Secretary Prescott Chamber of Commerce.

APPENDIX B.

Replying to your favor of recent date, will say that the history of dry farming in Yavapai County, Ariz., covers a period of barely 10 years, although the Indians in the northern counties successfully raised crops of Hopi corn and other drought-resisting cereals for centuries.

Dry farming received its greatest impetus after April, 1911, when Dr. V. T. Cooke, then the State Director of Dry Farming for Wyoming, visited the principal dry-farming areas in Yavapai County—more than 250,000 acres—under the auspices of the Prescott Chamber of Commerce. The following is taken from his report, written for that organization on April 10:

"No doubt exists in my mind to-day, after my visit in Yavapai County, and, taking into consideration information as to precipitation and general climatic conditions which I have gathered, but what so-called 'dry farming' can successfully be carried on with certain varieties of crops, provided the farmer will realize the importance of properly preparing his soil and using seed adapted to your particular conditions.

"Prior to leaving Cheyenne, Wyo., where for the past five years I have acted as State director of dry farming, I gathered weather data from the United States observer.

"I was agreeably surprised to note that you have here more precipitation than I had been led to believe; more, in fact, than was the case in my Wyoming experience.

"Yavapai County soils are extremely fertile; they are easier to work and more susceptible to the retention of moisture than those soils of Wyoming upon which I have achieved notable successes.

"During my several journeys from Prescott to outlying valleys I saw large areas which I am confident will raise paying crops of alfalfa, winter wheat, winter rye, spring barley, oats, and wheat, emmer (commonly called speltz), stock beets, potatoes, corn, sorghum, Milo maize, Kafir corn, and possibly winter barley, brome grass, and slender wheat grass.

"With these crops properly grown and cultivated and with summer tillage to conserve one year's moisture to another, thus obtaining two years' moisture for one maximum crop, and with proper rotation, I am confident some crop can be raised each year on Yavapai County dry farms.

"Invariably, whether under irrigation or by dry-farming methods, I can not too much emphasize the use of seed raised by natural precipitation."

V. T. COOKE,
State Director of Dry Farming for Wyoming.

Following Dr. Cooke's visit many entries on Government land adjacent to Prescott and in the contiguous valleys of Yavapai County were made, and by the end of June, 1911, the figures for the fiscal year aggregated 50,000 acres which had been filed upon under the homestead and desert acts, either of which in the State of Arizona permits the settler 320 acres of land.

Encouraged by the influx of farmers from all parts of the Union, the Prescott Chamber of Commerce, in July, completed plans for the establishment of an experimental dry-farming station just north of the city; here, on 110 acres, which represents nearly every soil existent in the dry-farming areas of the county, Prof. A. M. McOmie, of the University of Arizona, is personally directing a course of experiments with many of the crops mentioned. A brief résumé of the status of dry farming in Yavapai County may be of interest to the prospective settler:

E. W. Stephens, in Ferguson Valley, has matured a crop of corn on 80 acres of land which has had no irrigation; this crop has netted him not less than 50 bushels to the acre; it was planted late in June, after the soil had been plowed but 7 inches deep; on the same ranch 30 acres of small white beans were planted at the same time on an upland field, and, although somewhat injured by insufficient rains during August, this crop nets its owner $55 per acre.

C. A. Carter, on 40 acres of his farm in Kirkland Valley, estimates the yield at over 50 bushels; he expects to win the prize for the State of Arizona with this corn at the coming fair at Phoenix.

James Davis, in Ferguson Valley, has just harvested a crop of corn that goes over 50 bushels. This field was badly torn by hail in August, which resulted in cutting the blades seemingly to ribbons; this was the only damage done, however, and in many parts of his acreage the corn stood 15 feet high; in an adjacent field milo maize did equally well.

Davis bought his farm of 320 acres in 1909 for $1,000; it had been given up as an agricultural factor by its previous owner who had expended over $2,000 in improvements; since his occupancy Davis has made a good living for his family; has made a good crop each season, and has upwards of 300 hogs to reward his industry and perseverance.

Walter Atkin, farming on dry land about 2 miles south of Prescott, has just taken 70 bushels of Silverhull buckwheat from a field of 3 acres, this being the first dry-farm crop of buckwheat raised in Yavapai County. This buckwheat received the gold award at the International Dry Farm Congress, Colorado Springs, last October. Mr. Atkin's potatoes raised in a near-by field without irrigation, took the blue ribbon at the 1910 State fair.

We have said that dry farming is in its infancy in Yavapai County; but we believe that the above statements, which can be borne out by corroboration at first hand, are impressive and will command the serious attention of industrious, thrifty farmers, which is the only class we wish to draw to this section.

Over 100,000 acres of exceedingly fertile lands adapted to dry farming are now available for entry in this county.

Very truly, yours,

PRESCOTT CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

APPENDIX C.

During the last half century there have been granted to railroads approximately 115,500,000 acres of the public land, while during the same period there have been in round numbers 900,000 homestead entries gone to final patent, which have taken substantially 125,000,000 acres of the public domain. During the past 35 years, since the enactment of the stone and timber law and the desert-land law, there have been patented under the former act about 13,000,000 acres and under the latter about 6,000,000 acres, and during the past 40 years, under the timber-culture laws there were patented about 10,000,000 acres. There have been in the neighborhood of 500,000 acres patented as coal lands and also some other dispositions of the public domain in smaller amounts in various ways.

While there remains in the United States, exclusive of Alaska, approximately 317,500,000 acres of the public domain, and exclusive of about 190,000,000 acres in forest reserves, the fact is that all of these various entrymen made during the past 50 years have had the choice of the public domain and have very naturally selected the most fertile and productive land and the land most easily cleared and cultivated.

Those 900,000 homesteaders and the entries of thousand of preemption claimants, desert land, and stone and timber entrymen, as well as the railroads themselves, have culled over the lands of the Western States until to-day there only remain the lands that have been during all of these years and up to the present passed over many times and rejected as unfit for cultivation and not worth the effort required for their reclamation. The result is that at the present time our home seekers are not only becoming more and more reluctant to take the remaining isolated tracts of land, but the stringency of the rulings of the Department of the Interior and the construction placed upon the existing laws are, in the judgment of your committee, seriously retarding the development of the West. This statement is conclusively borne out by the very rapidly decreasing number of original entries.

In his annual report for the year 1911, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, at page 6, says:

"The total area of public and Indian land originally entered during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911, is 17,639,099.54 acres, a decrease of 8,752,169.55 acres as compared with the area entered during the year 1910."

This statement brings home to us very forcibly, indeed, the fact that during the past year the number of original entrymen, intending settlers upon the public domain, has fallen off 33⅓ per cent. That vividly discloses the startling fact that 55,000 home seekers and home builders that would naturally and have formerly gone out to select and settle upon our public lands have gone elsewhere during the past year. And when the records show that during that year 125,000 good American citizens—the farmers and backbone and sinew of this country—have gone to Canada, and not only expatriated themselves personally, which is by far the most serious loss, but have taken with them at the least estimate $125,000,000, the loss to this country can scarcely be estimated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ask the Senator from Arizona what disposition he desires to have made of the bill. Will the Senator have it referred?

Mr. ASHURST. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT OF THE SENATE.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolution which I submitted yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays the resolution before the Senate. It will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 357, submitted yesterday by Mr. BAILEY, as follows:

Whereas the Constitution of the United States makes the Senate the sole judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its Members; and

Whereas every Senator is required by his oath of office to decide all such cases according to the law and the testimony before him: Therefore be it

Resolved, That any attempt on the part of the President of the United States to exercise the powers and influence of his great office for the purpose of controlling the vote of any Senator upon a question involving the right to a seat in the Senate violates the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution, invades the rights of the Senate, and ought to be severely condemned.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, executive interference in a contest involving the right to a seat in this body is so manifestly improper that it must always seem—to me, at least—very improbable; and I would not have introduced this resolution if the information on which it is based had come to me in such a way as to permit any reasonable doubt of its correctness. There is, however, no reasonable doubt about the facts in this case; indeed, there is no possible doubt about them, because the President himself has stated them in the most public and formal manner. On the 25th of last April he delivered an address in the city of Boston, and as a part of that address he read a letter which he had written to ex-President Roosevelt under date of January 6, 1911. That letter recites certain efforts made by the President to control the vote of Senators on a question which the Constitution has wisely confided to the exclusive judgment of the Senate, and which every Senator is bound by his honor and by his oath to decide according to the law and the testimony before him. In order that the Senate may know from the President's own words the extent to which he proceeded in this matter, I will ask the Secretary to read the letter which I send to his desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

It comes to me, perhaps without foundation, that you are going to write a strong article on the Lorimer case and publish it in The Outlook. I have been doing everything I could legitimately to have the closest examination made into the Lorimer case. I have read as much of the evidence as I could get at, and I am convinced that there was a mess and mass of corruption upon which his election was founded that ought to be stamped with the disapproval of the Senate. But I want the movement to oust him to succeed. I have urged different Senators to read the record carefully; and after a talk with ROOT, and BURTON, and KNUTE NELSON, and CRAWFORD, and some others I believe we are going to line up a good many of the regular Republicans on the side of what I consider decency and honesty in politics.

It has leaked out that I have been taking some interest in the matter, and I fear that it has not helped the situation generally because of that strong feeling of clubdom in the Senate and that resentment against outside interference which nobody who is not intimately acquainted with the situation can understand the weight of. I was talking with BORAH this morning. I have consulted a good deal with him on the subject, and he and I agree that it would be unwise either for you or for me to come out now against Lorimer and in favor of his being ousted; that it would enable those who are determined to keep him in, especially, among the Democrats, BAILEY and others, to use an argument against outside interference that would hold a number of Democrats and would deprive us of the strength we should get by a quiet presentation of the full facts on the floor of the Senate from the Senate itself. ROOT is going to make a speech; so is BURTON, and I believe that LODGE will do the same thing. Now, nothing would have stronger weight than speeches from them, whereas if either you or I came out with an attack it would enable the friends of Lorimer to shift the subject from the tainted character of his seat to the independence of the Senate in acting as a judge of the qualifications of its own Members.

I suggest, therefore, that if you have an article on this subject you hold it until after the issues are more plainly made by speeches on the floor of the body in which the contest is to be won. I want to win. So do you. This is my excuse for writing you.

Sincerely, yours,

WILLIAM H. TAFT.

Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
The Outlook, 287 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

P. S.—Of course I may be misinformed as to your purpose in this matter. Since dictating the above I have had the telephone conversation with you, but I let it go.

Mr. BAILEY. The speech which includes that letter was made a public document by the Senate on the 29th day of April. It happened that I was not in Washington at that time, having gone to Texas upon a brief errand, and I knew nothing about it for some time afterwards. But even when I learned about it, I refrained from calling the attention of the Senate to it, because the matter to which it related was still pending here, and I thought that the Lorimer case ought to be decided without reference to any other question. I also thought that the President's intervention ought to be judged without reference to the Lorimer case, and under this conviction I postponed all comment on the matter until after that case has been finally disposed of by the Senate.

I do not think it necessary to detain the Senate with any elaborate argument in support of this resolution, because it and its preamble declare such self-evident truths that no Senator, I think, will venture to deny them. On many questions, the President can properly communicate his opinions to the Senate, and on some questions, such as appointments to office and the negotiation of treaties, I think he can properly exchange opinions with individual Senators; but he has no right to obtrude his opinion upon the Senate or upon Senators with respect to any question affecting the membership of this body, and it is essential to the orderly administration of this Government that he shall not be permitted to do so.

Remembering that the Senate is the sole judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, let us dispassionately examine the President's letter and see how far he has attempted to invade our constitutional privilege on that subject. I first invite your attention to this sentence:

I have urged different Senators to read the record carefully, and after a talk with ROOT and BURTON and KNUTE NELSON and CRAWFORD, and some others, I believe we are going to line up a good many of the regular Republicans on the side of what I consider decency and honesty in politics.

"I have urged different Senators to read the record carefully," says the President. In God's name, has the Senate of the United States fallen to a point of such unspeakable degradation that the President of the United States must summon its Members to the White House and urge them to read the record carefully in a case which they must decide upon their oath and upon their honor?

If the President had gone no further than to urge "different Senators to read the record carefully," he would, perhaps, have been guilty of no more than an impropriety, and I would not have deemed it of sufficient importance to have brought it before the Senate. But the President, according to his own statement, did not content himself with merely urging "different Senators to read the record carefully," for he declares in that same sentence that—after a talk with ROOT and BURTON and KNUTE NELSON and CRAWFORD, and some others, I believe we are going to line up a good many of the regular Republicans on the side of what I consider decency and honesty in politics.

What right had the President of the United States to "line up" Republicans, regular or irregular, upon the question of an election to this body? The right of a Senator to his seat ought to be determined upon the law and the evidence, and no political exigency can justify the application of any other rule. That ought never to be made a party question, and in this particular case it had absolutely no connection with party politics. But, sir, even if this had been a case in which it was proper for "regular Republicans" to be lined up, it was absolutely improper for the President of the United States to line them up.

For what was the President striving to "line up" these "regular Republicans"? Was it for a decision of that case upon the law and the evidence? No, sir. If the President had said that "I believe we are going to line up a good many of the regular Republicans" to decide that case according to the law and the evidence, there would have been good reason to complain at him for having said anything; but there could have been no just complaint against what he had said; but he did not say that, and although it was the sworn duty of every Senator to decide that case according to the election, the returns, and the qualifications of the Illinois Senator, the President proposed a wholly different test. His plan was to "line up" regular Republican Senators on the side of what "he considered decency and honesty in politics." I doubt if the President would be so willing now as he was aforetime to try a man on such an indictment, because his recent experience must have taught him how easy it is for a man's enemies to make a general charge of political dishonesty and how difficult it is for a man's friends to refute it, even when it is utterly unfounded. If we could believe what many "irregular" Republicans are saying about the President, he is not so stanch an advocate of "decency and honesty in politics" now as he was 18 months ago.

But I will not adopt or repeat the bitter things which his enemies say against the President. I am willing to believe that he is still an advocate of "decency and honesty in politics" as he understands them. He is not, however, more earnestly in favor of decency and honesty in politics than I am; and he has done no more, according to his ability to promote them, than I have. But as I understand my duty, when I come to determine the right of a Senator to a seat in this body, I am compelled to try the question upon a more definite basis, and unless the record shows that he was elected by bribery or corruption, I am bound by my oath of office to recognize his right to represent the State which has given him her commission. As a citizen of Illinois, or as a member of her legislature, it would have been my right, and it would have been my duty, to have voted against Senator Lorimer if I believed him an exponent of indecent and dishonest politics; but that right belonged, and that duty rested, with others and not with us. The question of fitness, of decency, and of honesty, is left by the Constitution of this country to those who choose our Senators, and we have no right to reject their choice unless he lacks the qualifications of age, residence, or citizenship, or unless his election was procured through bribery and corruption.

Not only was the President of the United States guilty of a meddlesome interference with a matter which belonged entirely to the Senate, and concerning which he had no duty to perform; but, sir, even if the Constitution had authorized him to advise us on that question, he had not qualified himself to give us intelligent advice. He did not know the facts. He had never read a line of the official testimony.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Texas is in error as to that proposition.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Texas is not in error.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Texas is in error as to the President not having the evidence, because the President did have the evidence. A number of Senators here in the Senate had the evidence.

Mr. BAILEY. All Senators had the brief of the attorney for the Chicago Tribune, but all Senators did not have a copy of the evidence. The printed evidence was not delivered to the Senate document room until the 7th of January, while the President's letter to the ex-President is dated January 6.

Mr. BORAH. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. They had the evidence; they had the evidence which was printed by the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. For the committee's use.

Mr. BORAH. For the committee's use. But it was distributed here among Senators and was the same evidence as afterwards was printed for the Senate. I had it myself; the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] had it; we all had that evidence before the holidays. I spent the entire holidays in going through the testimony, and there are plenty of Senators here in the Chamber who had the evidence at that date.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator was one of the few Senators who procured a copy of the evidence; but there was not a sufficient number printed before the holiday adjournment to have supplied each Senator with a copy.

Mr. BORAH. But, Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. I happened to be a member of that committee, and I know that when it came to act upon the case the committee desired to have, and it was necessary that it should have, the evidence taken by the subcommittee made available for its examination. That evidence was printed by the subcommittee for the use of the full committee, and if any Senator obtained a copy of it he obtained it from the committee or from some member of it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the evidence was printed by the committee and for the committee; but when the question was raised here upon the floor of the Senate as to whether or not it was available, the then Senator from Michigan, Mr. Burrows, stated that it would be available to the extent of a certain number of copies, and the Senator from Michigan went direct and brought copies into the Senate Chamber and handed a copy to me personally, as he did to other Senators.

Mr. BAILEY. That confirms my statement that if any Senator had a copy of it he obtained one of the committee copies.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, I apprehend that the committee copy was a correct copy, because upon that copy the Senator from Texas and his associates filed their report. We had all the evidence that the Senator from Texas had when he filed his report.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the interruption of the Senator from Idaho makes it proper for me to say that I have not intended to criticize him because the President had mentioned his name in this letter. I had not expected to refer to him in this connection; but since he has put me under that necessity, I feel that I ought to say, in justice to him, that I knew when I took the floor that he was one of the first, outside of the committee itself, to read the evidence. But the fact that the Senator from Idaho had read the evidence in full does not prove that the President had done so. What does the President himself say on that point? In his letter to the ex-President he says:

> I have read as much of the evidence as I could get at—

I do not see how that statement can be construed otherwise than as an admission that the President had not read all of the testimony, and therefore it is plain, to my mind, that he had not, up to that time at least, seen a copy of the printed evidence. If the Senator from Idaho had been called upon to state his knowledge of the case after he had obtained and read a copy of the printed evidence, would he have said that he had "read as much of the evidence as he could get at"? Would he not have said that he had read the entire evidence? Would any man who read it all have said that he had "read as much of the evidence as he could get at"?

But the fact that the President does not claim to have read all the evidence is not the only circumstance which justifies me in saying that he was not prepared to advise the Senate on that matter, even if it had been his privilege to do so. In his Boston speech—the same speech in which he read his letter to the ex-President, and almost immediately after he had finished reading that letter—the President thus expresses himself:

> I hope that my strong expressions of opinion in this letter, formed without hearing argument, may work no unfair prejudice in a cause that remains undecided.

As a lawyer at the bar and as a judge upon the bench the President of the United States had learned that even after hearing all the evidence the argument is often essential to a sound conclusion. So deeply embedded is this thought in our judicial proceedings that learned judges must often listen to stupid lawyers argue questions which they do not comprehend; because the arguments are deemed so important that it is considered better that a superior judge shall waste some time listening to an inferior lawyer than it is that he shall be deprived of the benefit of an argument from lawyers who can illuminate the question. The President realizes that an opinion formed without hearing the argument can not be relied on with full confidence, and he meant to concede that fact, or else his statement that he had formed his opinion "without hearing argument" is destitute of any meaning.

Can the Senate believe that the President was qualified to advise us about the Lorimer case when he had only read a part of the evidence and none of the arguments? Is that the way we should try a man in this country for his life or for his good name, which is dearer than his life? Was it just, was it fair, was it manly for the President of the United States, with at best but a partial knowledge of the evidence and with no knowledge of the arguments, to summon his partisans to the White House and encourage their attacks upon a Member of this body?

Yesterday, Mr. President, we witnessed a solemn and impressive ceremony in this Chamber—happily one of the few of its kind which have occurred in our history. We heard articles of impeachment exhibited against a circuit judge of the United States. Would any Senator here feel it consistent with his oath of office and with his duty as a judge in that impeachment trial to answer the President's summons and hear the President tell him whether or not he ought to vote for the conviction or for the acquittal of Judge Archbald? And yet he would have a better right to do that than he had to do the other. He appointed Judge Archbald to the bench, and it is natural that if the judge has been guilty of such misconduct as shows him unfit for that high office the President must earnestly desire to see the country relieved from the consequences of his own mistake. On the other hand, it is equally natural that if he believes Judge Archbald to be an upright judge and an honest man he would earnestly desire to see his character and his reputation vindicated. But in the choice of a United States Senator the President is under no responsibility, and having no voice in any man's election to the Senate, he should have no influence over any man's ejection from it. As well, sir, might the President of the United States send his messenger to the Supreme Court room and, summoning its honorable justices to his presence, tell them how to decide a lawsuit pending there as for him to call Senators to the White House and tell them how they should vote upon the question of a Senator's right to a seat in this body.

Was the President conscious that his course, to put it mildly, was irregular? I think he was. He must have been, or else he would not have spoken in that letter about it having "leaked out" that he "had been taking some interest in the matter."

Oh, what an expression to come from a President to an ex-President of this Republic! If the President of the United States was doing what he believed it was his duty to do, or what he had a right to do, there was no necessity of attempting to conceal it, and if there had been no attempt to conceal it, he would have never said that a knowledge of it had "leaked out." A President ought never to do anything which "leaks out." It may happen, of course, in the administration of justice or in our international relations, that it would not be compatible with the public interest for the President to announce his purposes or his negotiations; but the President of the United States should never do anything with respect to the Senate or its Members where a knowledge of what he had done might "leak out."

After telling the ex-President that it had "leaked out" that he had been "taking some interest in the matter," the President adds:

> And I fear that it has not helped the situation generally, because of that strong feeling of clubdom in the Senate, and that resentment against outside interference which nobody who is not intimately acquainted with the situation can understand the weight of.

Here is the old slander which has been made to do service for many years. For a quarter of a century the vicious have taught the ignorant to believe that the Senate of the United States is a mere club. Sometimes they call it a "millionaires' club," and in order to aggravate the prejudice against this body, they describe as millionaires Senators who are not worth the tenth of a million dollars. The President moderates the offensiveness of his reference to the Senate as a club by omitting the "millionaires," but he still does this body, and he does the sovereign States which it represents, the gross injustice of speaking of it as imbued with the narrow spirit of a club, and he puts its resentment against outside interference as second to the "strong feeling of clubdom." What answer will the Senate make to such a reproach upon it?

If the President had only declared that the Senate would resent outside interference with its functions, he would have paid you a tribute which your predecessors of other days deserved, and to which I hope you will establish your claim when we come to vote upon this resolution; but no man who entertains a proper respect for this body will tell his dearest friend that it is moved upon questions touching the integrity of its members by a "strong feeling of clubdom." I hold no brief to defend the Senate, and I am not in harmony with the opinions which dominate it to-day, but I bear cheerful witness to the fact that it is high above the poor opinion which the President expresses of it.

By a large majority the Senate decided the very case to which the President's letter related differently from what I think it ought to have been decided, and contrary, as I firmly believe, to the law and the testimony concerning it. But Senators whose character and patriotism do credit to the Senate and the country were governed in their votes upon that question more by what they believed was "a larger view" of it than by the law and the testimony. I feel sure that they were wrong in casting their votes upon such a consideration, but I know that some of them, right or wrong, were absolutely honest in what they did and acted for what they believed to be the highest welfare of the country.

Mr. President, no personal or party feeling ought to actuate the Senate in repelling an encroachment upon its privileges, and I am averse to introducing such topics into this discussion; but I do not see how I can ignore that sentence in which the President refers to me by name and to my party associates by designation. To leave that part of his letter without some comment might impress those who may now read, or who may hereafter read, this debate with the idea that what the President has said about us was either so true that we could not deny it, or else that we did not regard it as serious enough to call for an answer. With that idea in my mind I am constrained to take the President to task for what he said about me and about the Democrats of the Senate. I particularly invite your attention to this sentence:

> I agree that it would be unwise for either you or for me to come out against Lorimer and in favor of his being ousted; that it would enable those who are determined to keep him in, especially among the Democrats, BAILEY and others, to use an argument against outside interference that would hold a number of Democrats.

In naming me as one of those who were determined to keep Mr. Lorimer in the Senate I think the President was seeking to flatter an ancient grudge which the ex-President holds against me. But if that was not his purpose and he intended to imply that I desired to keep the Senator from Illinois in this body without regard to the law and the evidence, then he slandered me, and he deliberately slandered me; because no man knows better than he does that I discharge my duties here with absolute fidelity to my judgment and to my conscience. I do not enjoy a high degree of popularity among my associates because my unfortunate habit of bitter speech has often left a wound where I ought not to have left even a sting. I challenge error wherever I happen to find it, but I do not always challenge it with words or in a manner calculated to promote good feeling, and I have provoked more or less hostility in that way. But without regard to their personal good will or their personal ill will toward me, there is no Senator in this Chamber who thinks or who will dare to say that my course in the Senate is ever influenced by any unworthy motive. Some of them say that I am too severely technical and that I sometimes sacrifice substantial justice by adhering too rigidly to the letter of the law. They may be right, but I can not accept that philosophy. I can no more believe that there is a justice higher than the law than I can believe that there is a law higher than the Constitution. I know, of course, and I know it as well as any living man, that no law has ever been devised which will work out exact justice in every case; but I am certain that it is better for all the people that an occasional injustice shall be done than that the shifting and imperfect judgment of the individuals who try each case shall be substituted for those well-established rules which have been developed and matured by the wisdom of successive ages. I was trained in a school of politics which taught that it is the highest duty of every legislator to religiously obey the Constitution in making laws and that it is no less the duty of every man charged with the execution of those laws to execute them precisely as they were written. I know that a different view prevails in this day even among some Democrats, and I am willing to concede that they are as honest as I am, but I am sure that they have fallen into a grievous error and that sooner or later they must renounce that opinion. A distinguished Democrat quoted to me last Saturday morning the old Roman maxim that "the safety of the State is the supreme law," and I answered him, as I have answered others in the Senate before this, that the party to which I belong adopted in its infancy the wiser maxim that "the supremacy of the law is the safety of the State."

But, Mr. President, the reflection on me, if any reflection was intended by the President, is not so grave as the reflection upon my party associates. He pays me the compliment—though I doubt if he so intended it—of saying that I would denounce all "outside interference," and I am now justifying his opinion in that respect. But when he intimates that my Democratic colleagues would disregard the law and the evidence, would disregard even that "larger view" upon which some of them felt themselves compelled to decide the Lorimer case, and would be controlled by their resentment against his misconduct, he writes them down as lower even than those "regular Republicans" whom he was hoping to "line up." He knows some of these Democratic Senators as well as any Republican President ought to know them, but he knows less about them than I had supposed if he does not know them well enough to understand that they will resent his unwarranted interference with the privileges of the Senate in a proper way and not permit it to control their votes upon a different question.

Mr. President, I have now discharged what has been to me an unpleasant duty. It has been unpleasant because my personal relations with the President of the United States have been of the most delightful nature, and I would not lightly interrupt our friendship; but if he were my brother I would vote to censure him whenever he crosses the line which separates the executive and the legislative departments of this Government. Whether the Senate agrees with me or not means more to it than it does to me, for I am soon to retire from public life; and while I do not regret the 22 years which I have spent in Congress, I am waiting with impatient eagerness for the 4th day of next March to come, so that I shall be released from my duties and my obligations here. But while I will not be a Senator after that, I will know then, as well as I know now, that the future of my country depends in a large degree upon this assembly, and it is my fervent prayer that the Senate of the United States shall show itself worthy of its great power by exercising it on all occasions with firmness, dignity, and wisdom.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair calls attention to the fact that at that hour the unfinished business would ordinarily be laid before the Senate, and also that under the rule of the Senate the matter of the impeachment of Judge Archbald is to be considered.

The Chair will take the liberty of laying the unfinished business before the Senate first, with a view of having it laid aside temporarily. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. GALLINGER). The hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, and, in accordance with the rule, the legislative business will be suspended and the Senate will proceed upon the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald.

On yesterday the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] offered a resolution which in a moment of confusion the Chair supposed had been agreed to, but which the RECORD does not show was agreed to; and laboring under a misapprehension the Chair recognized the Senator from Wyoming to make a motion. The Chair will now lay the resolution of the Senator from Utah before the Senate. It will be read.

The Secretary read the order submitted yesterday by Mr. SUTHERLAND, as follows:

Ordered, That at 1 o'clock p. m., July 16, 1912, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, a United States circuit judge and a member of the Commerce Court, presented by the House of Representatives this day.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I suggest that there is no necessity for the adoption of that resolution in view of Rule III of our impeachment proceedings, and that the resolution is, in fact, out of order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, my purpose in offering the resolution yesterday was that a formal record might be made by which the House of Representatives would have notice. The rule to which the Senator from Texas calls attention does provide that the day following the presentation of the articles of impeachment, at 1 o'clock, the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of the impeachment case. That hour has arrived, and I see no purpose to be served by adopting the resolution at this time, and, with the consent of the Senate, I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is withdrawn.

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] entered a motion to reconsider the vote of the Senate on yesterday appointing a committee of five Senators.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understood the announcement to be made by the Chair that we had now entered upon the execution of the impeachment rule, which provides that at 1 o'clock we shall sit as a court of impeachment. Under that rule it occurs to me that the motion as a legislative act would not properly have place at this time. I give notice, however, that as soon as we go into legislative session I shall urge the adoption of that motion.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call attention to the latter part of Rule III, and suggest that the Senate proceed to the execution of the rule.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think it is perfectly evident that Rule III was adopted with reference to meeting at 12 o'clock. As the Senate assembled to-day at 11 o'clock, it is altogether probable that the hour of 1 as understood in the rule had passed at 12, it being evidently the intention that the impeachment proceedings should be taken up one hour after the assembling of the Senate.

I therefore ask that the matter be laid aside, having passed the time fixed, until the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] shall have concluded his remarks. I ask unanimous consent that that modification of the existing order be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent——

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator from Arkansas, but I would not be willing to interfere with this proceeding.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa rises to a point of order, which he will state.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is that under the rule of the Senate there is nothing in order at the present time save the administration of the oath to Senators who are present.

Mr. LODGE. Nothing else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained. The oath will be administered to the Presiding Officer by such person as may be designated by the Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I suggest that the oath be administered to the Presiding Officer by the senior Senator in the Chamber, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand the remark of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. NELSON. The rule prescribes that before proceeding to the consideration of the articles of impeachment the Presiding Officer shall administer the oath to Senators. The Senator from New Hampshire is now the Presiding Officer of the Senate. It is his duty to administer the oath.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My motion was directed to the point of the administration of the oath to the Senator from New Hampshire as Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the oath should first be administered to the Presiding Officer.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Chair if it is in order for any Senator to move that any particular Senator shall administer the oath.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would prefer not to take the liberty of ruling on that, preferring that the Senate itself should act.

Mr. STONE. As a matter of privilege I ask unanimous consent that the oldest Senator in service in this body administer the oath.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to make a motion that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] administer the oath to the Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection that order will be made, and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] will administer the oath.

Mr. CULLOM advanced to the Vice President's desk and administered the oath to Mr. GALLINGER as Presiding Officer, as follows:

You do solemnly swear that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States, from the third judicial circuit, designated a judge of the Commerce Court, now pending, you will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws. So help you God.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER). Without objection, the Chair will suggest that the Secretary will call the roll, calling 10 Senators at a time, and that as their names are called the Senators advance to the desk to have the oath of office administered to them.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, would it not be permissible for each Member to rise in his place and, with uplifted hand, be sworn at the same time by the Presiding Officer?

Mr. LODGE. If I may say so, this is the method heretofore pursued.

The Secretary called the names of Messrs. ASHURST, BACON, BAILEY, BANKHEAD, BORAH, BOURNE, BRADLEY, BRANDEGEE, BRIGGS, and BRISTOW; and these Senators, with the exception of Mr. BANKHEAD, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath was administered to them by the President pro tempore.

The Secretary called the names of Messrs. BROWN, BRYAN, BURNHAM, BURTON, CATRON, CHAMBERLAIN, CHILTON, CLAPP, CLARK of Wyoming, and CLARKE of Arkansas; and these Senators, with the exception of Mr. BROWN, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, and Mr. CHILTON, appeared, and the oath was administered to them by the President pro tempore.

The Secretary called the names of Messrs. CRANE, CRAWFORD, CULBERSON, CULLOM, CUMMINS, CURTIS, DAVIS, DILLINGHAM, DIXON, and DU PONT; and these Senators, with the exception of Messrs. CURTIS, DAVIS, DIXON, and DU PONT, appeared, and the oath was administered to them by the President pro tempore.

The Secretary called the names of Messrs. FALL, FLETCHER, FOSTER, GAMBLE, GARDNER, GORE, GRONNA, GUGGENHEIM, and HEYBURN; and these Senators, with the exception of Mr. FOSTER and Mr. GORE, appeared, and the oath was administered to them by the President pro tempore.

The Secretary called the names of Messrs. HITCHCOCK, JOHNSON of Maine, JOHNSTON of Alabama, JONES, KENYON, KERN, LA FOLLETTE, LEA, LIPPITT, and LODGE; and these Senators, with the exception of Mr. KERN and Mr. LEA, appeared, and the oath was administered to them by the President pro tempore.

The Secretary called the names of Messrs. MCCUMBER, MCLEAN, MARTIN of Virginia, MARTINE of New Jersey, MASSEY, MYERS, NELSON, and NEWLANDS; and these Senators appeared, and the oath was administered to them by the President pro tempore.

The Secretary called the names of Messrs. O'GORMAN, OLIVER, OVERMAN, OWEN, PAGE, PAYNTER, PENROSE, PERCY, PERKINS, POINDEXTER, POMERENE, and RAYNER; and these Senators with the exception of Messrs. OWEN, PENROSE, POINDEXTER, and RAYNER, appeared, and the oath was administered to them by the President pro tempore.

The Secretary called the names of Messrs. REED, RICHARDSON, ROOT, SANDERS, SHIVELY, SIMMONS, SMITH of Arizona, SMITH of Georgia, SMITH of Maryland, SMITH of Michigan, SMITH of South Carolina, and SMOOT; and these Senators, with the exception of Mr. RICHARDSON, appeared, and the oath was administered to them by the President pro tempore.

The Secretary called the names of Messrs. STEPHENSON, STONE, SUTHERLAND, SWANSON, THORNTON, TILLMAN, TOWNSEND, WARREN, WATSON, WETMORE, WILLIAMS, and WORKS; and these Senators, with the exception of Mr. WATSON and Mr. WETMORE, appeared, and the oath was administered to them by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Chair will suggest that the names of the absentees be now called.

Mr. LODGE. I was about to make that suggestion in order that the record might be complete.

The Secretary read the names of the absent Senators, as follows:

Messrs. BANKHEAD, BROWN, CHAMBERLAIN, CHILTON, CURTIS, DAVIS, DIXON, DU PONT, FOSTER, GORE, KERN, LEA, OWEN, PENROSE, POINDEXTER, RAYNER, RICHARDSON, WATSON, and WETMORE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators now present whose names have been called and who have not heretofore been sworn will present themselves and take the oath.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and Mr. WETMORE advanced to the Vice President's desk and the oath was administered to them by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators, the Senate is now sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit, designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I send to the desk an order for which I ask immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate is now organized for the trial of articles of impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, United States circuit judge, and is ready to receive the managers on the part of the House at its bar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the order will be now considered. The question is on its adoption. [Putting the question.] The order is agreed to. The Secretary will so inform the House of Representatives.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should like to call attention to Rule XXIII. I wish to suggest that in former cases the inconvenience of calling the roll in each instance has been avoided simply by having the order passed by unanimous consent rather than by putting it as a motion, as is ordinarily done. I would suggest that in this instance the vote just taken be either reconsidered or set aside as not having been properly had, and that the question be submitted by the Chair for unanimous consent in order that the record may thus appear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon reflection the Chair agrees with the Senator from Georgia, and will ask that that procedure be had. The Chair will ask, Is there objection to agreeing to the order? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator from Georgia whether he thinks that that is the rule? I do, for this reason. Rule XXIII provides that:

XXIII. All the orders and decisions shall be made and had by yeas and nays, which shall be entered on the record, and without debate, subject, however, to the operation of Rule VII.

Rule VII provides that:

VII. The Presiding Officer of the Senate shall direct all necessary preparations in the Senate Chamber, and the presiding officer on the trial shall direct all the forms of proceedings while the Senate is sitting for the purpose of trying an impeachment and all forms during the trial not otherwise specially provided for. And the presiding officer on the trial may rule all questions of evidence and incidental questions, which ruling shall stand as the judgment of the Senate, unless some Member of the Senate shall ask that a formal vote be taken thereon, in which case it shall be submitted to the Senate for decision.

The query arose in my mind whether it would be necessary to secure unanimous consent unless a vote was questioned by a Senator.

Mr. BACON. No, Mr. President, I think the Senator, I say respectfully, is not correct in that view. The rule is positive that upon all orders and decisions the vote shall be taken by yeas and nays except as provided in Rule VII. This is not one of the classes of questions provided for in Rule VII. It is not of that class at all, and manifestly it is one where, in the absence of unanimous consent, it would require that there should be a roll call. During the course of the trial questions must be decided. There are questions about which there will be no division, and if it is done by unanimous consent it complies with the intention of the rule, which is that wherever there is a division of the Senate upon any order or decision other than matters prescribed in Rule VII there shall be a record vote, and without debate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am under the impression that the rule of unanimous consent does not apply during an impeachment trial at all. The rule provides that the Chair shall decide. It provides the manner of an exception to the decision of the Chair. That is the whole story. The Chair is not required to inquire whether or not unanimous consent is given. The Chair rules primarily under the rule, and unless some objection is interposed in the manner provided by the rules the ruling of the Chair is final.

So I think that during the trial of an impeachment case in the United States Senate the rule of unanimous consent has nowhere an application.

Mr. LODGE. I am about to make a motion that the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, take a recess until 3 o'clock in order to give the managers on the part of the House time to assemble and appear here. Before making the motion, however, I call attention to the fact that the Senate sitting as a court, when it takes a recess, brings the Senate back into legislative session where it was. I now make the motion that the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, take a recess until 3 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate, sitting for the trial of impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, take a recess until the hour of 3 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, took a recess until 3 o'clock p. m.

EXPENSES OF IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in legislative session.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to present legislative business, of which I gave notice this morning.

Mr. WARREN. Then, I will ask to present what I now have. I present a joint resolution, which I ask may be read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 122) providing for the payment of the expenses of the Senate in the impeachment trial of Robert W. Archbald was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARREN subsequently said: From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 122) providing for the payment of the expenses of the Senate in the impeachment trial of Robert W. Archbald, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the joint resolution for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there be appropriated from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to defray the expenses of the Senate in the impeachment trial of Robert W. Archbald.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming if he thinks the amount provided for in the joint resolution is adequate for the purpose.

Mr. WARREN. The expenses of the last impeachment trial only amounted to about $7,000, and this joint resolution is so framed as to use whatever may be necessary. If more funds are needed, another joint resolution can follow.

Mr. BACON. I did not know what was the actual cost of the other impeachment trial, but I knew that the resolution then offered provided for an appropriation of about $40,000.

Mr. WARREN. It provided for $40,000, but only a little over $7,000 were used.

Mr. BACON. Yes; I understand that there was only about $7,000 of it used.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I now ask that the sundry civil appropriation bill be taken up, which is House bill 25069.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator from North Carolina why he objects to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. Because I desire to make a motion to take up the wool bill.

Mr. WARREN. Well, Mr. President, then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. WARREN. This is the regular order.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is a matter for the Chair to decide.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair decides very promptly that the motion made by the Senator from Wyoming is in order. The question is on that motion.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum, and I shall not therefore proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not hear the suggestion. The Senator from North Carolina having suggested the absence of a quorum, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Crawford	La Follette	Pomerene
Bacon	Culberson	Lodge	Sanders
Bourne	Cummins	McCumber	Shively
Bradley	du Pont	McLean	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Fall	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.
Briggs	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.
Bristow	Gallinger	Massey	Smoot
Bryan	Gamble	Myers	Stephenson
Burnham	Gronna	Nelson	Sutherland
Burton	Guggenheim	Newlands	Swanson
Chamberlain	Heyburn	O'Gorman	Tillman
Clapp	Hitchcock	Overman	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Johnston, Ala.	Page	Wetmore
Clarke, Ark.	Jones	Percy	Williams
Crane	Kenyon	Perkins	Works

Mr. JONES. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is detained from the Chamber on important business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration——

Mr. BACON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BACON. If the motion made by the Senator from Wyoming prevails, the unfinished business is displaced and the bill moved by the Senator from Wyoming becomes the unfinished business in lieu thereof. Am I correct in that?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from Georgia repeat what he said, as I did not quite understand it.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] moved to proceed to the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] called for the regular order, which would be the resumption of the consideration of the Panama Canal bill. The question was raised whether the motion of the Senator from Wyoming was or was not in order, and I understood the Chair to say, before the roll was called for the purpose of ascertaining whether a quorum was present, that it would be in order. I then rose to a parliamentary inquiry, to ascertain if the Senate upon a majority vote should sustain the motion of the Senator from Wyoming, whether the unfinished business would not thereby be displaced and no longer be the regular order, and by that vote the appropriation bill would itself become the regular order, the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will frankly state, in response to the parliamentary inquiry of the Senator from Georgia, that when the Chair ruled he had forgotten the fact that the unfinished business had been temporarily laid aside. The Chair is of the opinion that a demand for the regular order would take the Senate back to the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BAILEY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. I wonder if the Chair could tell me exactly what becomes of my resolution under this condition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that if the Senator should ask unanimous consent to continue the discussion of the resolution it would be quite in order; in fact——

Mr. BAILEY. I have some other things that it would please me to say; but if the Senate would be good enough to adopt the resolution I would be willing to take the resolution and spare the Senate the speech.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order having been demanded, the Senate will resume consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Texas be allowed to continue his remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I will testify my appreciation of the Senate's kindness by occupying as little of its time as will enable me to conclude what I feel I ought to say.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas allow me to interrupt him for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I desire to know whether or not the motion made by the Senator from Wyoming was put to the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was not put to the Senate; at any rate——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And I further desire to inquire whether the Panama Canal bill still remains the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does still remain the unfinished business. Had the motion of the Senator from Wyoming been put to the Senate and agreed to, it would have displaced the unfinished business beyond question.

Mr. WARREN. I did not intend to displace the regular unfinished business when I made the motion. It has been generally understood here that when the unfinished business was laid aside temporarily, it was laid aside for the day, unless called up again, and I made the motion in deference to that custom.

I may say, however, that if the Senate expects to proceed orderly with its business, it seems to me there will have to be a time allowed for the appropriation bills in order to get them to conference. Our conferences this year on appropriation bills have been and will doubtless continue to be extended and laborious, and it seems to me that I shall have to, so far as I can, if not at this time, then very soon, undertake to displace any and all things possible in order to get the appropriation bills through, because the Government must be provided with funds, and it is running now under a temporary resolution which lasts but a few days.

CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT OF THE SENATE.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to say a few words. I do not, however, want to take the time of the Senator, if he has not concluded his remarks.

I should not feel called upon to say anything in regard to this resolution if I did not feel that to remain silent would be in some sense to shirk a part of the responsibility for this letter. I am not willing, therefore——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me a suggestion?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to say that I did not intend to mention the Senator's name, if I had done so—and the Senator observed that in reading the letter I omitted that part—I intended, before the Senator interrupted me the first time, to say that while the President admitted he had never read this evidence that was not true of all the Senators, and I happen to know it was not true of the Senator from Idaho. I happen to know that the Senator from Idaho had one of the copies of the testimony prepared by the subcommittee for the consideration of the full committee. I hope the Senator understands that my personal relations with him are such that it would be impossible for me to believe that he had committed himself to the decision of a question before he knew anything about the law or the facts involved.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, on the 21st day of December, 1910, the Committee on Privileges and Elections filed with the Senate its report upon the matter of the title to his seat of Mr. Lorimer from Illinois. When that report came in some discussion followed as to the time necessary for the consideration of the evidence and the time which had been given in its consideration. While I do not propose to trespass upon the time of the Senate to read from the record of that days' proceedings, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD a portion of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 21, 1910, pages 552, 553, and 554.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, leave will be granted as requested.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. BEVERIDGE. * * * On last Friday night I received a notice that the full committee would meet on Saturday at 10 o'clock. The committee did meet on that date, and a report of the subcommittee to the full committee was presented, together with the statement of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Frazier], to which the chairman of the committee has just alluded, which I am sorry is not presented with the report and other matters just laid before the Senate. But, I take it, this could not be done under the telegram the chairman has read.

Mr. President, when the committee met at 10 o'clock last Saturday the testimony was laid before all the members of the committee. That was on Saturday morning. Speaking for myself, it was the first time I had seen the testimony. I understood also that there were briefs more or less voluminous, neither of which I had seen.

After the report of the subcommittee was read and other statements, including that of Senator Frazier, were submitted, a motion was made that the report of the subcommittee should be adopted by the full committee. I was not able to assent to that proposition at that time for the reason that I had not read the testimony and had had no opportunity of doing so.

For that reason I asked that the matter might go over until after the holidays so that this testimony might be examined. The committee would not agree to that.

Then I asked for a week in which to examine the testimony and briefs. The committee, in its wisdom, of which I make no criticism whatever, would not agree to that. Finally, upon the withdrawal of the motion to adopt the report then presented by the subcommittee on last Saturday, the full committee adjourned on motion to meet and finally dispose of the matter on yesterday morning, thus giving the members of the committee who had had no opportunity to examine the testimony and the briefs until Tuesday morning to make such examination before making up their minds.

This seemed to me to be too short a time. It amounted to one-half of a working day; that is, Monday forenoon; or, if you include Sunday, one day and a half. The Senate itself can judge of that. Here is the testimony. It is a volume of 748 pages, closely printed. Here are the precedents involved, or some of them—a large volume. Here are the briefs—one of them nearly 200 pages long.

I immediately took the testimony away with me, and finally, on Saturday afternoon, got a copy of the brief in behalf of Senator Lorimer, but I was not able to get the brief which I understood had been printed on the other side until Monday morning.

On Sunday I entered into the investigation, so as to inform myself whether I could intelligently, one way or the other, concur or dissent from the report.

On Sunday it was quite impossible to examine with any kind of care even this brief, which is over 190 pages in length; it was impossible to examine the testimony in that brief time, so at the committee meeting on yesterday, when the motion was made to adopt the conclusion of the subcommittee and authorize the chairman to draw the report which has just been filed, I was not able to vote in favor of it, but, on the contrary, was impelled to vote against it, because, using all possible diligence, I had not been able, not only not to master, but even carefully to investigate the testimony, the briefs, or the precedents.

For this reason, Mr. President, I am not able either to concur with or dissent from the report of the majority of the committee, and shall not be able to determine whether I shall do so until I have given to these matters—the testimony, the arguments, and the precedents—such investigation and study as satisfies my mind one way or the other—such study as so serious a matter requires.

I thought it necessary to state this to the Senate so that the Senate might know why I can not concur or dissent. I therefore reserve the right, as I did in committee, to take such action as my judgment compels when I have had an opportunity to investigate these matters—which I trust I have shown to the Senate has not existed heretofore so far as I am concerned. I reserve the right, as I did in committee, either to concur or dissent or file a minority report.

Mr. President, I have served on this committee, I think, for about 12 years, and I recognize the gravity and seriousness of a case like this, not only as it affects the Senator whose name is in question, but as it affects a State and the Senate itself. There ought to be no delay on the one hand nor any inconsiderate haste on the other hand. We are about to adjourn. We shall reconvene immediately after the Christmas holidays. That will give to any Senator who desires diligently to examine the matter time to do so and to arrive at his conclusions. That having been done, Mr. President, I think all Senators will agree, without exception, that the case should be expedited and concluded.

I therefore ask unanimous consent that at an appropriate time, quite early after the reconvening of the Senate after the holiday recess—say Monday, January 9—the report of the committee just given to the Senate and laid on the table subject to call, together with any other reports which may be made in the premises, shall be taken up for consideration and made the special order, to be continued from day to day until Saturday, the 14th of January, unless sooner disposed of, at which time, before adjournment on that day, the report of the committee and all questions arising thereunder and any other reports that may be filed, together with any resolution that may be offered up to that time, shall be voted on and finally disposed of.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I understand the matter, this is a privileged question, which can be called up at any time and discussed by the Senate. I am not willing that it shall be put in such attitude that it will displace the unfinished business, which is now the matter before the Senate, but of course the consideration of a question of this kind will not be opposed whenever the chairman of the committee feels that it is his duty to call it up.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I understand that, and, as I tried to state, the reason for the request for unanimous consent was that a definite period might be fixed. I thought we might thus best expedite the matter, which, I take it, everybody desires to have disposed of. I assume that a definite period—if this is too long a time, reduce it—would answer the ends of the reasonable disposition, not only of this business, but of the other business of the Senate.

Of course it lies on the table, subject to the call not only of the chairman of the committee but also of any other Senator—the Senator can make it broader than that—but if that should be the case, and it be called up one day, discussed, and then go over for a week, the discussion might go on to the end of the session without arriving at any conclusion. Of course I merely want the sense of the Senate upon it. Whatever the Senate decides will be the law of the case.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have made my request for unanimous consent, and I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I gather from the remarks of the Senator from Indiana that he desires to reserve the right to file minority views if he should conclude so to do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I reserve the right to either concur, dissent, or file a minority report, or anything else dictated by the study of the testimony, briefs, and precedents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that he may be allowed to file his views on the report just made. Is there objection?

Mr. BURROWS. There is no objection to that, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Indiana has that permission.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I desire to say further that I think the Senator from Indiana must have misunderstood the resolution passed by the Senate and my request that the report of the committee lie on the table.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; I understood that.

Mr. BURROWS. The very object of that was to give to every Member of the Senate the opportunity to examine the testimony and the report. In that way we fully meet the criticism of the Senator from Indiana that there has been undue haste in the matter——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I expressly stated that I made no criticism at all. I merely stated the facts as to why I can not now concur or dissent from the majority report.

Mr. BURROWS. In order to give time to examine the report and the testimony, I have asked that the report lie on the table and the testimony printed in sufficient quantity to supply the Senate. There is no occasion for fixing a date for the consideration of the report.

As has been well said by the Senator from New Hampshire, this is a privileged report and can be called up at any time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I expressly state that I make no criticism on the committee or any member thereof. I am familiar with the proprieties. I have stated merely the facts. The Senate can see for itself that it was not an excuse, but an explanation as to why I myself am not ready to express any opinion upon this case, either concurring with or dissenting from the majority report. There [exhibiting] is the volume of testimony—748 pages closely printed; here [exhibiting] is one of the briefs—nearly 200 pages long; there [exhibiting] is another; and here [exhibiting] is an abstract. The time given——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course the Senator might have been otherwise engaged, but a very elaborate brief for the petitioners in this case was sent to me, and I assume was sent to every member of the committee, and probably to every Member of the Senate, something like two months ago, or certainly more than a month ago.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. As I have said in my remarks, to interrupt the Senator right there, I never saw nor heard of these briefs until the meeting of the committee on Saturday last. On Saturday afternoon I succeeded in getting the brief of Mr. Hanecy, but was unable to get the other briefs—I was informed at that time that they were in existence—until Monday morning, when I did get them, and I never saw the testimony until last Saturday morning at committee meeting.

The Senate itself can judge whether or not I am unreasonable in saying that, even working on Sunday, which would allow a day and a half before the final meeting of the committee, there was sufficient time to go through a volume of 748 pages, a brief of 190 and some odd pages, and another brief of I do not know how many pages, to say nothing of the precedents.

At least, Mr. President, working with some diligence, I could not do it. I state that not in criticism of anybody else, but as a reason why I am not able to act this morning, and I made the same statement in the committee yesterday morning.

Now, as to the other point of the Senator from Michigan, Mr. Burrows, I am not urging haste. Not being able, for the reasons given, thoroughly to familiarize myself with the case—and, I repeat, the Senate can judge for itself whether a day and a half, including working on Sunday, is enough to go through all of these volumes and all the authorities cited—it seems to me that the holidays would afford enough time. And if the holidays do afford enough time, we should then proceed to consider and conclude the case without unreasonable delay. That is the only request I made.

Mr. BURROWS. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. BURROWS. Does the Senator know of any criticism of him because he did not feel able to concur or dissent at that meeting of the committee?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, no; except the one the Senator implied. He did not mean it, but he implied one when he stated a moment ago that, in the first place, I complained of haste and now I wanted to make haste. I am trying to show that the Senator is in error, and he will see it himself.

I said, as the Senator will remember, when I asked that opportunity to investigate the record of the case be given those of us who were not members of the subcommittee, that the time during the holidays would be sufficient. The committee would not agree to that. Then I asked for only one week. The committee would not agree to that.

I do not desire, on account of my not having gone through 748 pages of testimony and the briefs and precedents in a day and a half, including Sunday, to delay this matter. It struck me—and it is a matter I have thought of since I have been sitting here in my seat—that it would serve the ends of justice, the convenience of Senators, and the settlement of the whole great question involved if, a reasonable time having been given to all Senators to examine the testimony and the arguments, that a specific time then be fixed for taking up and determining the report of the committee, any other reports that may be filed, and any resolutions that may be based upon them.

If the 9th of January is too early to take the matter up, I would change the dates in my request for unanimous consent so that it would be taken up on Monday, the 16th, and continue until Saturday, the 21st, unless we can dispose of it earlier than that. That would give one week.

Mr. BORAH. This discloses, Mr. President, that upon that day the evidence was subject to the call of those Members of the Senate who desired to call for it; that while it had not been published by the Senate, there had been a print of it by the committee, and that print was subject to the call of Members of the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, whatever the records may show in that regard, that is not correct. The committee had no authority to print the testimony for the use of the Senate until the Senate ordered it printed. The committee had authority to print only for the use of its own members; and no part of the testimony had been printed except for the use of its members. I distinctly recall that I procured at least one and probably two copies of it for some of my friends in the Senate who wanted to read it during the holidays.

Mr. BORAH. The point which I was pressing was not the technical proposition as to whether or not the print had been made under the control of the committee for the Senate; but the fact was that the evidence was in such shape that it could be had by Members of the Senate to read, and that that was a condition which had existed for some days, and that briefs on the subject had been upon the tables of Senators for weeks and weeks prior to that time.

The Senator from Texas stated upon that day, when the Senator from Indiana was asking for time:

> Of course the Senator might have been otherwise engaged, but a very elaborate brief for the petitioners in this case was sent to me, and I assume was sent to every member of the committee, and probably to every Member of the Senate, something like two months ago, or certainly more than a month ago.

The matter which I desire to have the RECORD disclose is that those who were discussing this matter with the President or anyone else upon the 6th day of January, 1911, had had the testimony for nearly a month and had had the briefs for a month and a half or two months.

One further matter:

In this letter the President refers to the fact that apparently there was a disposition to let the matter go by default. Perhaps that was an unfortunate expression upon the part of the President. Yet the history of the situation at that time discloses that that was an expression which might very properly come from almost anyone engaged in a discussion of the matter.

Mr. BAILEY. Permit me to call the Senator's attention to the fact that this statement of the President about going by default was not made in the letter written in 1911; it was made in his speech on the 25th day of last April. It is part of the speech, and not part of the letter.

Mr. BORAH. Whether the expression appeared in the letter or in the speech, the facts which I am about to narrate to the Senate would, I think, justify its use.

On the Friday prior to the 21st day of December, 1910, the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections made its report to the general committee. The Senator from Indiana, Mr. Beveridge, asked for an extension of time to read and discuss the testimony. That was denied to him by the committee. He again asked for an extension of time, as he says in his statement here, and again the committee thought it proper to refuse the extension of time.

It is a notorious fact, Mr. President, known to all who are familiar with the condition of affairs at that time, that notwithstanding the report of the subcommittee did not come to the general committee until the 18th day of December, and notwithstanding the general committee did not report until the 21st day of December, and that in two or three days we were to adjourn for the holidays, there was an urgent disposition to dispose of that matter prior to the holidays.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him there?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. Instead of there being an urgent disposition on the part of the committee to dispose of it, there was an urgent insistence on the part of somebody that the committee should make its report before the holidays.

While I am on my feet, I want to say that it is not true that the committee denied Senator Beveridge any time that he wanted. It is true that the committee, when ready to make its own report, was not willing to delay it in order that Senator Beveridge might have his dissenting opinion ready to file with the opinion of the committee. But it did not deny him any opportunity that he wanted to examine the record.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, Mr. Beveridge says in his statement:

> On last Friday night I received a notice that the full committee would meet on Saturday at 10 o'clock. The committee did meet on that date and a report of the subcommittee to the full committee was presented, together with the statement of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Frazier], to which the chairman of the committee has just alluded, which I am sorry is not presented with the report and other matters just laid before the Senate. But, I take it, this could not be done under the telegram the chairman has read.
> Mr. President, when the committee met at 10 o'clock last Saturday the testimony was laid before all the members of the committee. That was on Saturday morning. Speaking for myself, it was the first time I had seen the testimony. I understood also that there were briefs, more or less voluminous, neither of which I had seen.
> After the report of the subcommittee was read, and other statements, including that of Senator Frazier, were submitted, a motion was made that the report of the subcommittee should be adopted by the full committee.

Now, it is but fair to say, it seems to me, that if this matter was in such a condition and the record was so that the full committee could pass upon it within the time which it undertook to pass upon it, whatever other criticism may be lodged against the President for the letter it should not be said that he did not have an opportunity to examine the facts some 30 days thereafter. The subcommittee made its report upon a certain morning, and upon the same morning voted to send its report out of the committee into the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him there?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator wants to indulge in that kind of a reflection upon the committee, I am more than ready to meet it. I want to tell him now that no matter what Senator Beveridge said, it is not true that every member of the full committee had not been furnished that evidence before the subcommittee met. I do not know whether it is in that record or not. If it is not, it ought to have been suggested, when Senator Beveridge made that statement, that if he had never examined that record until that morning it was his own fault, because as soon as the subcommittee had concluded its labors it put its report into print and furnished it to the full committee.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not reflecting upon the committee. I assume that when the committee signed that report they had had ample time to examine the 800 pages of testimony.

Mr. BAILEY. What was the purpose of the Senator in saying that they came and at once made the report if he did not mean to imply that they made the report without consideration?

Mr. BORAH. It was this. My object and purpose in making the statement was that if this committee, upon evidence which it had before it and the record which was before it, could pass upon it on the 21st day of December, the President, on the same record, could be fully informed on the 7th day of January.

Mr. BAILEY. But the President said he had read only such parts of the evidence as he could get at, making it plain that he had not read what the committee had.

Mr. BORAH. No; it does not make it plain that he had not read what the committee had. It makes it plain that he had read what the record discloses. Whether that should be regarded as a full and complete showing or not might be a subject of discussion, but he had the same record and he had the opportunity to have the same record, and there is no proof that he did not have what the committee had when it signed its report on the 21st day of December.

Now, Mr. President, a number of Senators here know it to be true that this record was taken by them during the holidays and examined upon their part and thoroughly analyzed, and when we convened after the holidays they had fully studied, considered, and digested the evidence and the law and made up their mind in regard to this record. It was a matter which was being discussed here and there, and was much more familiar in a way than it was to Senators a month thereafter, because they had thoroughly studied it during the time they had nothing else to do except to consider it.

This is what leads me, however, to say what I am saying. I learned that Col. Roosevelt was to write this article. I did not think it was a wise or a proper thing to do, and I went to the President and told the President that, in my judgment, it was not a wise thing to do to have the matter discussed in that way; neither was it a fair proposition; that this was a matter which ought to be settled by the Senators themselves. I have no doubt, in fact I know, that it was upon my suggestion that the President wrote and asked that that article be not published. It was not, in my opinion, upon his initiative, but having learned it in a way that I could not doubt, I felt that Col. Roosevelt ought not to take that course, and that the discussion ought not to proceed along that line. Now, I never saw the letter after it was written until it was published at Boston.

Let me say another thing. The Senator seems to think that wherein the President says that he—the Senator from Texas—was determined to keep Senator Lorimer in the Senate is a reflection upon the Senator from Texas. It might seem so upon the face of the letter, but I happen to know, and I want to say to the Senator from Texas in public, that that was not the construction which the President put upon that language.

The Senator from Texas at that time had signed this report. He had made known to the world that he believed that this man was innocent of these charges and that his title was good. Everyone who knows the character and disposition of the Senator from Texas knows that when he takes a position back of it always is his determination, and it was in that view that the President of the United States used that language in that letter. I would not say so from the construction of the letter had I not been in the discussion with him and known precisely what he meant. I do not myself consider it to be a reflection upon the Senator to have it said that in so grave a matter and so important a matter, after he had made up his mind and announced it to the world, he would put forth his best efforts to carry his convictions to a successful result; and that is the fair construction which is to be placed upon the letter.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho makes it plain to the Senate that he had discussed with the President of the United States the letter, and therefore he knows what was in the President's mind. I am glad to know that the President did not intend what I thought the letter fairly implied, and upon the statement of the Senator from Idaho I want to withdraw what I said about the President on that point. I shall take leave, unless it is denied me by the Senate, to omit that from my remarks.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not at liberty, I presume, to go into the details of what was said in the conversation at that time, although I presume I might do so in view of the fact of the publication of the letter. But I will say, in a general way, that no part of that conversation could have been construed into a reflection upon the Senator from Texas. It would have been a reflection of the most unfortunate kind had not the exact position which the Senator from Texas had taken in that matter been known. But that was thoroughly known. No one who knows the Senator from Texas ever doubts what his attitude will be toward a question after he once announces his position.

I think, Mr. President, I shall not go into a discussion of another feature of this matter. I doubt if the circumstances would justify it. But I have felt constrained to say this much for the reason that I could not sit silent and permit the entire responsibility for this matter to rest upon the President. I have no doubt in my own mind that the letter was written by reason of the suggestion which I myself made. The exact language of the letter or the references therein made, of course, I knew nothing about until after the letter came out, but I felt then—and I have no doubt that that was the proper view of it—that the matter should have been decided just as the President, in the latter part of the letter, said it should be decided, by the record and the result of discussion in the Senate.

Strange as it may seem to the Senator from Texas, the object of the President in writing this letter was to bring about that situation in so far as he could. I did not know of anyone at that time who could reach to the ex-President so well as the President, and therefore I went to the President upon that proposition.

It might be said further, Mr. President, as a reflection upon myself, that I had no business at the White House discussing a matter upon which I was to pass as I was to do in that matter. But, Mr. President, I had, as I said, taken the testimony and read it during the holidays. I made up my mind as to what the record disclosed and as to what it proved. I had no doubt as to the justice of my position, and having concluded myself, after a thorough investigation, I felt that there was only one thing that ought to be done—that the title should be declared void, but that it should be done under such conditions that it could be said that the Senator from Illinois had been given a fair hearing.

As to what ought to happen, as to what the judgment ought to be, as to what our conclusion should be when we finally came to it, I had no doubt after reading the evidence, and I have never had any doubt since.

Mr. McCUMBER. This resolution, Mr. President, ought not to pass in the form in which it is written. A resolution declaring the attitude of the Senate under circumstances of the kind mentioned in this instrument it seems to me to be quite proper at this time.

Mr. President, I am a friend of the President of the United States, both a personal and a political friend, a friend before the convention and a friend after the convention. I would have done him no injustice before, nor would I stand idly by and see an injustice done him at the present time.

I have never been in the habit of deifying anything human or assuming that any man was not capable of making a mistake. I think a President of the United States does make a mistake whenever he attempts to influence votes one way or the other upon a question of the right of a Senator to a seat in this body. I believe equally the ex-President or any other man who, knowing that a case is before the Senate, every Member of which is sworn to do his duty as he sees it, is never justified in attempting to influence that Senator any more than he would be justified in attempting to influence a judge upon the bench.

I further believe that the great press of the country when it threatens the seat of any Senator who has the courage of his convictions is guilty of a more gross wrong than either the President or any other individual. In making such a threat against any Senator for the purpose of compelling him to surrender his convictions to their particular wishes the press commits an offense against the Senator, against the accused, and against the country.

But, Mr. President, I do believe that we are justified at this time in saying to the world that the Senate has confidence in its own integrity; that it has confidence in its own desire to do what is right; that it has confidence in its own purpose to make the laws for the Government in accordance with the dictates of its own conscience and its best judgment. That is the function of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. And when any President, I do not care for what purpose, steps in and seeks to control the Senate in the manner that is indicated here—and I will use the words of the resolution—"that any attempt on the part of any President of the United States to exercise the powers and influence of his great office" for the purpose of controlling that which is wholly within the jurisdiction of the Senate of the United States, ought in appropriate words of the Senate to be checked. We know that that has been the custom of the Executive for the last 10 years, and the press of the country has justified the Executive in exercising a greater power over legislation and other matters before Congress than was ever contemplated by the framers of the Constitution.

The Senate of the United States has been on the pillory for 10 years, and anyone who did not follow the advice of the President of five, six, and seven years ago was subject to execution. I believe that the Senate ought to reassert itself; that it ought to have the courage to assert its exclusive functions, and not to be controlled by the Executive; and the Executive ought to understand the constitutional limits of his authority as written in the Constitution of the United States; and that each of the great departments of this Government ought to proceed and be secured in the performance of its own particular duty without influence or force being brought upon it by any other department of the Government.

I therefore, Mr. President, am going to ask, because I am perfectly willing to vote for a proper resolution, that an amendment be made which will add, after the word "Senate," these words:

Or any other matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Senate.

I think the President has just as much right to use his influence in reference to the right of a Senator to a seat in the Senate of the United States as he has to use his influence in a matter of confirmation of one of his appointees, and no more. In either case we act as judges upon the evidence submitted, and justice should be blind to everything but the evidence.

Mr. BORAH. Or upon the reciprocity question.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just one moment. I would move to strike out the latter part of the resolution, which reads "and ought to be severely condemned." I do not think under the history of this country for the last 10 years we ought to condemn severely that which has grown into a sort of custom and which through the influence of the press of the country has come to be regarded by the people of the country as a proper function of the Executive; but I believe with that stricken out and making the resolution the mere declaration of a principle that will clearly indicate our position it might then properly pass.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is never very difficult for a man to declare that he believes himself to be honest. I doubt very much if it will add particularly to the dignity of the Senate throughout the country if we ourselves declare that we still think we are honest and that we have capacity to legislate. Just as sure as we proceed we will proceed along the lines upon which we have been proceeding for the last quarter of a century, and that is that the executive department and the legislative department will be constantly cooperating and dealing with one another in reference to legislation in all matters which concern either department.

If we would cease doing it and operate upon our own responsibility alone it would be much better notice to the country than to continue to violate the rule and once in a while pass a resolution that we think we can get along by ourselves.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment.

The Senator from Idaho seemed impressed with the view that what I have said about the President's unwarranted interference in the late contest from Illinois necessarily involved some reflection upon the Senators whose names he mentioned in that letter.

I avoided any comment upon those Senators for two reasons. First, although I had not discussed it with him, I felt sure that the Senator from Idaho had examined that testimony before he ever expressed his opinion about that case.

My acquaintance with the other Senators whose names the President felt at liberty to mention is not such as to warrant me speaking for them, but I am sure that they must have known something about the evidence before they pledged the President to make a speech upon the case. Therefore, I was willing to assume that they, like the Senator from Idaho, had procured one of the few available volumes of that evidence. I know—and I learned that within an hour—that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] had one of them, but he did not find it possible to obtain it before he left the city of Washington, and he taxed the good offices of the Senator from Idaho to send it to him. But I did not think it proper to assume that those Senators had not made up their minds. The only criticism against them which I think the record warrants is that they permitted the President to talk with them upon a matter of that kind.

I agree that we have fallen into the evil habit of conferring with the President upon all matters and taking, I will not say instruction, because that would be offensive, but taking his advice upon those matters which relate to us alone.

I hope the time will come again, and maybe it will come again, when we will go back to the rule which prevailed with some, at least, under Madison's administration. I would not vouch for the accuracy of it, but it is related that on one occasion Madison sent for John Randolph, of Roanoke, to come to the White House, and when Randolph reached there Madison began to ply him with an argument upon some matter pending in the House of Representatives, of which Randolph was then a Member. Randolph drew himself up and in that shrill voice for which he was peculiar he said: "Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States makes the Executive and the Congress separate, and damn me if I do not intend to keep them separate as far as I am concerned."

I do not think there was any profanity, I do not think there was even any impiety, in Randolph's emphatic refusal to hear the President further. Madison had no right to attempt to influence a man whom the Constitution, through the preference of the people, had assigned to a different department of the Government.

I hope to see another time when every President who undertakes to talk with a Senator or a Representative upon those matters which the Senators and Representatives ought to decide for themselves will get an answer like that which Randolph made to Madison.

But what I was complaining about in this particular connection was that the President had not read the record. The Senator from Idaho seems to think that the President's expression does not admit of that construction. But the Senator from Idaho must know that if the President had read all there was in the case (and if he had that published volume he would have read all that there was in the case) he would have said that he had read "as much of evidence as he could get at." The very expression which he uses makes it manifest that he had not read the testimony. But, Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator from Idaho, though intended as an exoneration of the President, makes his attitude more pitiful, if possible, still, because, although they were trying to dissuade the ex-President from formulating and printing his assault upon the Illinois Senator, they hardly dealt candidly with him.

I will not say they; I will say the President did not deal with him in perfect candor. He led the ex-President to believe not that it would be an improper thing, as the Senator from Idaho admits it would have been, for the ex-President to try to create a public sentiment which would force the judgment of the Senate, but the President of the United States attempts to impress the ex-President of the United States that the way he was laying down the rule was the best way to play the game, not for justice, not for fairness, not for the dignity either of the President or the Senate, but to win.

That is what the President undertakes to impress upon the mind of the ex-President, and I regret to say—yet I ought not to regret it because I know that nothing else could happen—that when a President of the United States begins to do what he can not openly do, he will find himself enmeshed in just such toils.

Now, Mr. President, I do not believe that these other Senators sought the President as the Senator from Idaho did. The Senator from Idaho sought him with a very laudable purpose. I concede that the Senator from Idaho felt that the publication which the ex-President intended to make was not only hurtful to what he believed was the justice of the cause, but he believed that it was unfair for a man of the ex-President's great reputation to throw the weight of his popularity against the defendant in the Senate. That was a high view to take of it, and I can well not only excuse but I can commend the Senator from Idaho for going to the President to enlist his good offices to prevent that wrong. But he went to him not as the President of the United States, he went to him as the one man whose request would be most potential with the ex-President; in other words, if I may be permitted to interpret the feeling of the Senator from Idaho, it was that if there had been a Senator here more potential with the ex-President than the President he would have gone to that Senator. If there had been a citizen of his acquaintance with whom he felt at liberty to speak on such a subject he would have gone to that citizen.

This resolution does not touch that. Whatever I may think about the matter, I carefully refrained from translating my own opinion on this particular case into the resolution. This resolution does not deny the President as a member of his party the right and even the opportunity to confer with his partisans upon a party question. We leave all that aside. That is the reason why I hope the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] will not press his amendment.

There is a line which we must recognize, a line at which the President confers with his partisans, not as the President but as their fellow partisan, and I doubt if it would be possible to administer this Government under party responsibility if we denied the Members of the President's party the opportunity to counsel with him not with respect to what we do as Senators but what we would do as Republicans or Democrats, as the case might be.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I think the Senator from Texas did not clearly hear the amendment which I offered. The amendment dealt with those questions which were exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Senate. The question, for instance, of the trial of an impeachment is exclusively a question for the Senate. The question as to whether or not we confirm an appointment is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Senate. The question of legislation upon which the Executive advises and upon which he can advise generally, and upon which the other branch must act, is not exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Senate. I think the Senator will agree that my amendment is proper.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not hear the word "exclusive."

IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER). The hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, the Senate will resume the trial of the impeachment of Judge Robert W. Archbald.

At 3 o'clock and 1 minute p. m. the managers of the impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives appeared at the bar, and their presence was announced by the Sergeant at Arms.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will conduct the managers to the seats provided for them within the bar of the Senate.

The managers were conducted to the seats assigned them within the space in front of the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Gentlemen managers, the Senate is now organized for the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit, designated a judge of the Commerce Court.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON rose and said: Mr. President, we, as managers on the part of the House of Representatives, are directed by the House of Representatives to appear at the bar of the Senate, which we now do, and demand that process be issued to Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit, designated a judge of the Commerce Court, and that he be required to answer at the bar of the Senate the said articles of impeachment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I offer the order which I send to the desk, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming offers an order and asks for its immediate consideration. The order will be read for the information of the court.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That a summons be issued, as required by the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, returnable on Monday, the 22d day of the present month, at 12.30 o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not know how far it is proper for me to offer an amendment to this order, but it seems to me the time is rather far. I move to substitute Friday of this week for Monday next. It is simply for an appearance.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But, I remind the Senator from Georgia, in the previous case four clear days were allowed, and fixing the date for appearance in this case on Friday would allow only two days; but, of course, the earliest practicable date would be preferable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia move an amendment to the order?

Mr. BACON. I will suggest that possibly the managers on the part of the House might desire to be heard on that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will be pleased to have any statement from the managers concerning the matter.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, I am directed by the managers to say that, in their opinion, the notice ought to be issued at an earlier day than that specified in the order which has been suggested, for the reason that when Judge Archbald is served with the process, he then may request a reasonable time to make his answer to the articles of impeachment. There is no reason why this order requiring him to answer at the bar of the Senate should not be forthwith issued. That is the opinion and the suggestion respectfully submitted, on the part of the managers, that this order requiring him to appear here be issued to take effect at an earlier day than that indicated in the order suggested by the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order may be changed to "Friday" instead of "Monday."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming has the right to modify the order; and the order will be stated as modified.

The SECRETARY. As modified the order reads as follows:

Ordered, That a summons be issued, as required by the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, returnable on Friday, the 19th day of the present month, at 12.30 o'clock in the afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the order as read? The Chair hears no objection, and the order is agreed to unanimously.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON (at 3 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.). Mr. President, I beg to say on behalf of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives that they will await the further pleasure of the Senate.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives thereupon retired from the Chamber.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I offer the following order, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the order.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the Senate, sitting for the trial of impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, adjourn until Friday, the 19th instant, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have no objection whatever to this order, but I beg to call the attention of the Chair and of the Senator from Wyoming to the following rule:

IX. At 12.30 o'clock afternoon of the day appointed for the return of the summons against the person impeached, the legislative and executive business of the Senate shall be suspended, and the Secretary of the Senate shall administer an oath to the returning officer in the form following:

* * * * * * *

X. The person impeached shall then be called to appear and answer the articles of impeachment against him.

It would seem to me, therefore, that the court of impeachment must, in any event, reconvene at 12.30 o'clock upon the day required for the appearance.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire that that modification be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the order will be made to conform to Rule IX, making the hour of meeting 12.30 o'clock, and the order will be agreed to as modified.

The order having been agreed to, the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, stands adjourned until 12.30 o'clock p. m. on Friday, the 19th instant. The Senate will resume its legislative session.

CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT OF SENATE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 357 submitted yesterday by Mr. BAILEY.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I accept the first amendment suggested by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and rather than to have any differences amongst those who believe some action is appropriate, I will accept the latter amendment also; but before I do it I want to say that I fully understand the old controversy about the right of the Senate to censure the President, a controversy that raged about the person and history of Andrew Jackson. The resolution of censure was finally expunged; but this, I will say, does not condemn this President or any President by name. It really condemns a practice. It declares a certain practice unconstitutional and condemns it. If I had drawn the resolution to expressly condemn President Taft I would have omitted that, knowing the opinions of some leading Senators upon that subject, and I would myself have doubted the wisdom of it. I drew this resolution in the hope that every Senator in this body could support it, and in that hope I will accept both amendments.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from Texas that striking out the last words would necessitate the insertion of the word "and" before the word "invades."

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator is exactly right about that. Of course, that would be necessary to make it properly express the idea. First, Mr. President, I will strike out, beginning with the word "and," after the word "Senate," in line 6, down to and including the word "condemned," in line 7, and insert between the word "Constitution" and the word "invades" the word "and." The Senator from North Dakota has an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification suggested by the Senator from Texas will be stated. Will the Senator from North Dakota withhold his amendment?

Mr. MCCUMBER. I withhold it, Mr. President.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out at the end of the resolution the words "and ought to be severely condemned," and after the word "Constitution," in line 6, and before the word "invades," to insert the word "and"; so that if amended——

Mr. BAILEY. Now, in order that the matter may be entirely before the Senate, I hope the Senator from North Dakota will propose his amendment.

Mr. MCCUMBER. The Secretary has the amendment at the desk, and I ask him to read it.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Senate," in line 5, it is proposed to insert "or any other matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Senate"; so that, if the amendments are agreed to, the resolution will read:

Resolved, That any attempt on the part of the President of the United States to exercise the powers and influence of his great office for the purpose of controlling the vote of any Senator upon a question involving the right to a seat in the Senate, or any other matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Senate, violates the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution, and invades the rights of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would suggest the substitution of the words "would violate" for the word "violates" to avoid the implied charge that these things have been perpetrated. I think, if you are going to declare a principle, it should be impersonal, and if you will declare that these things would violate a certain rule, it will rid it of the charge that it is directed against some act that has been performed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I want to be as obliging as possible, but I fear we will have nothing of the resolution left. I want to be frank with the Senator. If this had never been done, I would regard this whole proceeding as unnecessary. The fact that it has been done is the only excuse, or the only reason rather—for it is not an excuse—for adopting any resolution on the subject.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would deprecate the doing of the acts set forth in this resolution, but I also deprecate the idea of one coordinate branch of the Government condemning by a specific resolution another.

Mr. BAILEY. We have eliminated that part——

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but if you will substitute the words "would violate" for the present expression "violates" it would carry the spirit forward. I entertain rather positive views in regard to the propriety of a President of the United States doing certain things, but I also condemn in my mind the propriety of a coordinate branch of the Government irresponsibly condemning another coordinate branch.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HEYBURN. In a moment. If this was crystallized into a responsible act of the branch of the Government authorized under the Constitution to make charges, then it would be what I term a "responsible act," but this is the mere utterance of an opinion. I now yield to the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, what I care most for is the assertion of the principle; and while I have felt provoked by this particular circumstance to propose an assertion of the principle, I can understand that Republican Senators who are supporting the President do not want to appear to condemn him. To avoid that, and in the hope that we still can all agree to assert the principle, I will accept the amendment the Senator from Idaho proposes, so that it may read "would violate."

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask the Secretary now to read the resolution as it will then appear.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, it is proposed to strike out the word "violates" and in lieu thereof to insert the words "would violate," so that if amended the resolution will read:

Resolved, That any attempt on the part of the President of the United States to exercise the powers and influence of his great office for the purpose of controlling the vote of any Senator upon a question involving the right to a seat in the Senate, or any other matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Senate, would violate the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution and invade the rights of the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. President, in order to make the resolution conform to that amendment, I will ask to strike out the article "the" before the word "President" and insert the article "a," so as to make it read "That any attempt on the part of a President of the United States," and so forth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question upon the amendment submitted now by the Senator from Texas to perfect the resolution, which amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Before the word "President," in line 1, it is proposed to strike out the article "the" and to insert the article "a."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the resolution of the Senator from Texas, if it could be separated from the argument that has accompanied it and the circumstances which surround it——

Mr. BAILEY. Strike out the argument, then, and adopt the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wish some of it might be stricken out; and, upon reflection, perhaps some of it may be stricken out. However, that will not deter me from saying that, if it were not for the contemporaneous construction of the purposes proposed and the fact that it has followed so close upon the heels of a controverted question, which has occupied the attention of the Senate for weeks and months, I think it might not be so entirely inappropriate, but before I cast my vote I want it known that in the performance of my duty, as a Senator or in either branch of Congress, I have never been influenced by the President of the United States in any way, shape, or manner.

I read all the testimony in the Lorimer case before the President wrote this letter to Col. Roosevelt, and I had no difficulty whatever in obtaining my copy of the testimony. I simply asked for it and received it. I spent the Christmas holidays last year reading it.

Mr. BAILEY. Whom did you ask for it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I asked the then chairman of the committee, Senator Burrows.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, you got a committee copy. That is what I have said.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He sent it to me here on the floor and I read it carefully. I am not going to say by my vote on this resolution that the President of the United States did not have it, and that he did not have as much information on this case as other men had, and possibly more.

A careful reading of the letter to Col. Roosevelt does not disclose that President Taft was attempting to influence Senators in their vote. The language in the letter to Col. Roosevelt is that he asked certain Senators to read the testimony. Is that an offense? I know of no impropriety in such a course.

I believe that the Senator from Texas aims at a very worthy end, and if it were his farewell to his associates here it would be entirely worthy of him, but I do not propose to be put in the position of criticizing the President of the United States for anything he has attempted to do with Senators in the settlement of the Lorimer case, and if my voting "yea" on this resolution would be regarded as a personal rebuke I should hesitate a long time before I so voted.

I do not believe the President of the United States could influence the men he has mentioned by name in that letter. I do not believe he could influence the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], although he is his friend. Every man in this Chamber knows that the Senator from Ohio is an honest man and that he decides public questions for himself. Neither do I believe that he could influence the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. I am certain he did not influence the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], because, as I recollect it, the Senator from Massachusetts did not speak at all on the case. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] was not called to the White House in this matter; he went there of his own volition. What for? For the purpose of influencing the President of the United States to write a letter to Col. Roosevelt; and he succeeded in his mission, as the record shows. He did not go there at the President's request; and I think it is a far cry to say that the course of the President of the United States determined the conduct of Senators in a matter of such importance. For my own part, I am unwilling to thus stigmatize his motive, which I believe to have been praiseworthy. He has not undertaken to influence me, and I do not believe he has ever undertaken to influence the Senator from Texas——

Mr. BAILEY. And nobody else has.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Nobody has any influence with the Senator from Texas [laughter]; nobody tries to have, because all know that he is well informed and of such sturdy stock that he does his own thinking; and as a humble Senator on this side of the Chamber no one values his public service more highly than I do, but for us to formally sit here all day considering the desirability of building a new constitutional fence of pasteboard around the White House and ourselves fixing limitations within which the President may appropriately walk, is little less than grotesque and purely voluntary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask for the reading of the resolution as it has been amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as modified by the Senator from Texas.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified as follows:

Resolved, That any attempt on the part of a President of the United States to exercise the powers and influence of his great office for the purpose of controlling the vote of any Senator upon a question involving the right to a seat in the Senate, or any other matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Senate, would violate the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution and invade the rights of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the resolution as originally offered by the Senator from Texas was entirely clear; it was incapable of being misunderstood; and I would have voted for it very heartily. I am not so sure with respect to the resolution as it has been amended. It was not long ago that I had occasion to call the attention of the Senate to the invasion which the Executives had been making upon the legislative branch of the Government now for 10 years or more. I pointed out then what seems to me to be the greatest danger of the future, namely, the subordination of the will of the individual legislator to the will of the Executive.

I do not believe that the President of the United States ought to attempt to influence, through his office and his vast power, any Member of the Senate or any Member of the House of Representatives with regard to any duty that he may be called upon to perform. If I may rank impropriety, it is in my judgment a greater impropriety to use the power of his office to induce men in Congress to vote for or vote against a bill which will affect the welfare of ninety millions of people than it is to attempt to influence the judgment of Senators or Members of the House of Representatives with regard to the title of either a Senator or a Member of the House to his seat in Congress.

I recognize that the President has a high function to perform in advising and in recommending legislation through appropriate and honest and open channels, anticipated by the Constitution and provided by the forefathers; but I shall never assent to the new idea, so generally adopted in these days, that it is the party duty of Members of Congress to follow the wishes of the President of the United States because he is the party leader. As for myself, I hold it to be my duty to express my convictions in every vote I cast, free from either the coercion or the influence, not of the President, but of the power of the President.

This resolution, as now sought to be amended, practically says to the country that while we repudiate the effort of a President to use the power of his office to control a vote when the question is concerning the seat of a particular Member or concerning any other subject of which we have exclusive jurisdiction, it is entirely proper for the President to use this power, to use the office which he holds, in order to influence legislation and to direct the course of affairs in that way.

I can not vote for a resolution which makes a discrimination of that kind. I would have been glad to have voted for it in its original form, because it did not involve the influence which it will now involve if passed.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Iowa that the resolution as drawn ought to have been voted upon without amendment, and it was drawn with reference to that particular question because that is the only question upon which we have the President's word that he has been intervening. Consequently I thought it proper to confine it to that. But I also felt that if it was possible to have a unanimous vote of the Senate asserting that the President ought not to meddle with matters like this it might produce a wholesome effect.

I wish to say to the Senator—I have already said I would not allow any President of my own party or of any other party to undertake to influence my vote on any question—that I do not think this resolution by condemning the other implies that we would not condemn that. The only thing is that this resolution was drawn to fit a particular case. If you can find anything in the record where the President has written a letter saying he was trying to influence Senators on a particular bill I will include that, too.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know of any such letter.

Mr. BAILEY. On the ex-President's desk, perhaps, you could find one.

Mr. CUMMINS. But if an oft-repeated statement, repeated during the course of years, is to be accepted, we know that not only the present President of the United States, but the former President of the United States, and possibly some before him, have attempted to secure legislation, not through the ordinary channels of recommendation, but through personal solicitation, and under such circumstances as indicated the withdrawal of favor if the representations were not accepted.

I do not want to criticize either the Chief Executive at this time or the former President, or any President. I do not concur with the suggestion that we have no right to talk with the President of the United States about legislation. I think we have, but there is a vast difference between consulting with him with respect to any duty we have to perform, and recognizing that the power of his office is being exerted upon us in order to accomplish results which he may believe to be wise.

This resolution refers to the power of his office; not to his views as a man, but the power of the office which is overwhelmingly great; and, so far as I am concerned, I intend to do what I can in the future to reestablish the independence and the dignity of the legislative branch of the Government and to restrain the power and the influence of the Executive within proper bounds. It is only because I understood from the Senator from North Dakota that he had offered the amendment which has been accepted by the Senator from Texas, in order that it might be clear that such proceedings as confirmations of nominations and the like were included within this reprimand, and that all other conduct of the Congress or of the Senate might be excluded and thereby we would not condemn the power of the office exercised in order to secure legislation that I have made the observations I have made.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Iowa that I myself do not think it offends against either the letter or the spirit of the Constitution for the President to confer with an individual Senator about an appointment. When the Constitution authorizes the President to make appointments by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, I think the advice might as well be taken in advance of the appointment as not. Of course the consent must be to the appointment, but he makes the appointment by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and I think there it is permissible. I do not believe, however, it is permissible at any time for him to seek to influence the action of a Senator on any question through the power and influence of his office. I agree with the Senator there.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Texas and I concur entirely about it. I believe there should be the utmost liberty and freedom of intercourse between the legislative and the executive branches of the Government, but what I mean is this: That no President who values the Constitution of this country or the institutions established under the Constitution can come to the Senate and say to a Senator: "If you do not vote for this measure or that measure you will no longer be recognized as a member of this party." What I mean to say is that a President shall not suggest that if a Senator does not pursue this course or that course, then the favors of the appointing power shall be withheld from him. Those are the things I have in mind, and there are many others of similar character that might easily be enumerated.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. May I ask the Senator whether he knows of any cases of that kind?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Michigan had better not insist on an answer to that inquiry.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would be very glad to have the answer.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, then, if the Senator from Michigan wants the answer, I say there have been such instances. I hope that for the harmony of the party to which we both belong he will allow the specific circumstances to remain unmentioned and to be forgotten as rapidly as the human memory can operate.

But to return to this resolution, I really hope that the Senator from North Dakota in his efforts to modify the resolution will not exclude from it those things which I am sure he believes to be just as sacred from improper Executive influence as the subjects which are specifically enumerated.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. This discussion has taken a wide range with reference to the relationship of the executive to the legislative department. The powers under the Constitution of each department are well understood and the duties are pretty well defined, and it is a question of fact before the American public as to whether the executive department has been encroaching upon the legislative department or whether the legislative department has been encroaching upon the executive department.

Before we take this vote I should like, if it will not interrupt the Senator, to read a statement upon this subject. It is from a ripe scholar, a profound student of American institutions, and now an acknowledged leader in public affairs.

Mr. BAILEY. Is he now a candidate for anything?

Mr. BORAH. I am not reading it with a view of discussing the candidacy of the party, but as the view of one who has deeply reflected upon this subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Idaho name the title of the book from which he reads? I shall then be able to determine whether I ought to yield or not.

Mr. BORAH. Will not the Senator yield until he knows?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Idaho had better gratify my curiosity in that respect.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to read from Congressional Government, by Dr. Wilson.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Dr. Wilson says:

> Independently of experience, however, it might reasonably have been expected that the prerogatives of the President would have been one of the most effectual restraints upon the power of Congress. He was constituted one of the three great coordinate branches of the Government; his functions were made of the highest dignity; his privileges many and substantial—so great, indeed, that it has pleased the fancy of some writers to parade them as exceeding those of the British Crown—and there can be little doubt that, had the presidential chair always been filled by men of commanding character, of acknowledged ability, and of thorough political training, it would have continued to be a seat of the highest authority and consideration, the true center of the Federal structure, the real throne of administration, and the frequent source of policies. Washington and his Cabinet commanded the ear of Congress and gave shape to its deliberations; Adams, though often crossed and thwarted, gave character to the Government; and Jefferson as President, no less than as Secretary of State, was the real leader of his party. But the prestige of the presidential office has declined with the character of the Presidents. And the character of the Presidents has declined as the perfection of selfish party tactics has advanced.
> It was inevitable that it should be so. After independence of choice on the part of the presidential electors had given place to the choice of presidential candidates by party conventions—
>
> "Tell it not in Gath; publish it not in the streets of Askelon," > it became absolutely necessary in the eyes of politicians, and more and more necessary as time went on, to make expediency and availability the only rules of selection.
> As each party, when in convention assembled, spoke only those opinions which seemed to have received the sanction of the general voice, carefully suppressing in its "platform" all unpopular political tenets, and scrupulously omitting mention of every doctrine that might be looked upon as characteristic and as part of a peculiar and original program, so, when the presidential candidate came to be chosen it was recognized as imperatively necessary that he should have as short a political record as possible, and that he should wear a clean and irreproachable insignificance. "Gentlemen," said a distinguished American public man, "I would make an excellent President, but a very poor candidate." A decisive career which gives a man a well-understood place in public estimation constitutes a positive disability for the presidency; because candidacy must precede election, and the shoals of candidacy can be passed only by a light boat which carries little freight and can be turned readily about to suit the intricacies of the passage.
> I am disposed to think, however, that the decline in the character of the Presidents is not the cause, but only the accompanying manifestation, of the declining prestige of the presidential office. That high office has fallen from its first estate of dignity because its power has waned; and its power has waned because the power of Congress has become predominant. The early Presidents were, as I have said, men of such a stamp that they would under any circumstances have made their influence felt; but their opportunities were exceptional. What with quarreling and fighting with England, buying Louisiana and Florida, building dikes to keep out the flood of the French Revolution, and extricating the country from ceaseless broils with the South American Republics, the Government was, as has been pointed out, constantly busy, during the first quarter century of its existence, with the adjustment of foreign relations; and with foreign relations, of course, the Presidents had everything to do, since theirs was the office of negotiation.

Moreover, as regards home policy also those times were not like ours. Congress was somewhat awkward in exercising its untried powers, and its machinery was new, and without that fine adjustment which has since made it perfect of its kind. Not having as yet learned the art of governing itself to the best advantage, and being without that facility or legislation which it afterwards acquired, the Legislature was glad to get guidance and suggestions of policy from the Executive.

But this state of things did not last long. Congress was very quick and apt in learning what it could do and in getting into thoroughly good trim to do it. It very early divided itself into standing committees which it equipped with very comprehensive and thoroughgoing privileges of legislative initiative and control, and set itself through these to administer the Government. Congress is (to adopt Mr. Bagehot's description of Parliament) "nothing less than a big meeting of more or less idle people."

[Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. When was that? [Laughter.] Not now, I am sure.

Mr. BORAH (reading)—

"In proportion as you give it power, it will inquire into everything, settle everything, meddle in everything."

[Laughter.]

In an ordinary despotism the powers of the despot are limited by his bodily capacity and by the calls of pleasure; he is but one man; there are but 12 hours in his day, and he is not disposed to employ more than a small part in dull business; he keeps the rest for the court or the harem or for society." But Congress "is a despot who has unlimited time, who has unlimited vanity, who has—or believes he has—unlimited comprehension, whose pleasure is in action, whose life is work." Accordingly, it has entered more and more into the details of administration, until it has virtually taken into its own hands all the substantial powers of government. It does not domineer over the President himself, but it makes the Secretaries its humble servants. Not that it would hesitate, upon occasion, to deal directly with the Chief Magistrate himself, but it has few calls to do so, because our latter-day Presidents live by proxy; they are the Executive in theory, but the Secretaries are the Executive in fact.

Mr. HEYBURN. What is the page of that book?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it seems to me we ought to go a little slow in this matter, in view of what may occur in the next few months.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I want to say that I hope some of the views expressed there will be entertained by the author after the 4th of March.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt they will all be entertained, because every one knows that Dr. Wilson has well-settled views and convictions.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of what kind?

Mr. BORAH. But for fear that we may be called upon to retrace our steps after the Senator from Texas, to the great regret of all of us, shall have left the Senate, we ought to go slowly. I invite your attention to the views of your leader.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have been delighted to hear this extract from the writings of the distinguished candidate of the Democratic Party for President. I assume, however, that he believes that after the 4th of next March the ancient dignity of the presidential office will be restored. I think, however, that inasmuch as he is in favor of the recall of everything, he will be much inclined to recall his estimate of the relative power of the President and of Congress.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Did I understand the Senator from Iowa to say that Gov. Wilson has declared himself in favor of the recall of everything?

Mr. CUMMINS. I really meant the recall of all Republican Presidents. I did not intend to speak inaccurately.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do not think the Senator from Iowa would misrepresent to the country Gov. Wilson's attitude. He has been very accurate in stating his views on certain national problems. He has indicated the policies that he favors and those to which he is not committed. It would of course be an injustice to him to state, as I understood the Senator to remark a moment since, that he favors the recall in all things, because that would be an inaccurate statement to make.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from New York will not take so seriously a suggestion of that sort. I do not remember precisely what Dr. Wilson holds in that regard, but I had in mind his desire for a general readjustment in public affairs.

But to return to the resolution from which we have drifted far: If the resolution referred only to the proper influence of the President in the matters which are mentioned here, I would have no objection to it. But the resolution names that influence which ought not to be exercised by the President under any circumstances or upon any subject. I know very well that he ought to exercise an influence. His recommendations ought to have great weight. His very position entitles him to great consideration. But the power that is mentioned in the resolution is a power that he can not properly exercise upon Senators in the performance of their duties. Therefore it seems to me we ought not to select certain things that come within the jurisdiction of the Senate and say that as to them the President ought not to interfere or meddle, leaving the inference that as to all others he may justly and properly exercise this unwarranted power.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, if this resolution were offered under other circumstances or at another time there would be nothing objectionable in it. It states a principle which is universally accepted. It censures the exercise of the powers and influence of the presidential office for the purpose of controlling the vote of any Senator. That seems to imply some degree of compulsion, of undue influence, as by the bribery of patronage.

But how can we disabuse our minds of the idea that this is the aftermath of a controversy relating to a seat in this body which was decisively settled last Saturday? How can we separate this discussion, with its utterances, from alleged acts of the President of the United States during the pendency of the Lorimer case? From this standpoint it seems to me the resolution is altogether objectionable.

I must go rather further than some have gone in this discussion. The relation between the President and Congress is not such as to prohibit him from the freest consultation with any Senator or Representative. He has absolute liberty to offer his advice and suggestions. No impenetrable wall is built up between the Executive and Congress. The hands of the President are not fettered, nor is his tongue tied so that he can not express his opinions, even with earnestness, to any Member of this body or to any Member of the House. And I ask those who are promoting this resolution whether they would have commended the course of the President of the United States if he had kept silent, in view of the great interest and widespread agitation which prevailed relating to the Lorimer case?

The newspapers were discussing it. They were full of paragraphs in regard to it. We were receiving advice from numerous fellow citizens concerning it. An impression prevailed in the country that Mr. Lorimer's selection by the Legislature of Illinois was tainted by corruption. In a way not only was the Legislature of Illinois on trial, but the Senate of the United States. Serious reflections upon our methods of electing Senators were uttered throughout the country.

In view of the mention of my own name in this controversy, I wish right here to say just a word. I think I may speak with entire propriety of a conversation with the President of the United States. He simply asked that I should carefully read the record in the case. There was no urging——

Mr. BAILEY. Did he ask the Senator to make a speech?

Mr. BURTON. I myself stated that I would make a speech after I had read the record in the case. Possibly he may have asked me—I say this in order to be entirely accurate—to make a speech in case I came to a conclusion in regard to it. However, I do not at this moment recall his having made that request.

The request was made some time before the holidays. It is idle to claim here that the President had not the opportunity to obtain knowledge of the case. On the 21st day of December the record of testimony was completely made up. The number of pages was stated by Mr. Beveridge on that day in the discussion on the floor of the Senate. By going to the room of Senator Burrows Members of this body who desired it could obtain a complete copy of the record before the holidays commenced.

It seems to me, Mr. President, the course of our Chief Magistrate was that of the leader of his party.

Mr. BAILEY. Is this a party question?

Mr. BURTON. It is decidedly a party question. No party could allow a Senator to occupy a seat in this body if that seat was obtained by bribery and fraud without a reflection against it, not merely in this body, but from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

The party has the responsibility to purge itself of corruption in elections in any legislative body controlled by it. The President is not alone Chief Magistrate. He is the head of his party. He is the first citizen of the Republic.

Mr. BAILEY. Which head of it now?

Mr. BURTON. I hardly know what the Senator from Texas has in mind, and I think I will not take time to answer that question.

The President's advice is eagerly sought. He is in a position to understand the currents of public opinion. He is peculiarly able to determine what is right, and if he fails to use the great powers of his office he is failing in his duty.

I know it is an ungracious task in any way to speak in the least degree critically of a legislative body, but, Mr. President, this Senate or any other Senate or any House is strong or weak, efficient or inefficient, just in proportion as it meets the great issues of the day. We must concede that many legislative bodies have not proven equal to the great occasions which have confronted them. At such times the Executive looms large.

The Executive has often been a commanding figure and exceeded the normal boundary of his power when Congress cooperated with him. Abraham Lincoln made the remark that he thought it very likely that the Constitution would be subjected to some most severe strains for a time. In that great emergency he often assumed powers which belonged to Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I am not contending for a minute that he did in violation of the Constitution.

Mr. BAILEY. Would the Senator——

Mr. BURTON. But at this time and at all times the people of the United States will commend a strong and a forceful Executive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to be certain that I do not misunderstand the Senator. I understood the Senator to say that in such a time the Executive ought to assume the powers of Congress.

Mr. BURTON. I did not say that. I expressly qualified what I said by stating that I did not believe in any violation of the Constitution, but that at times, as in the case of Lincoln, he went beyond the ordinary constitutional powers of the President.

Mr. BAILEY. We have charged that, but your party have been denying it all the time.

Mr. BURTON. Well, I admit it, and I glory in it. He had to meet the emergencies of the times, and he met them courageously. Your party, or at least a portion of it, commends President Lincoln, who oftentimes went to the very verge of his constitutional prerogatives. Your party, or at least a portion of it, commends Andrew Jackson, who also went to the very verge.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator be good enough to specify a single instance in which Mr. Cleveland went even, as he calls it, to the very verge?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, well, there was the matter of appointments. He paid little attention at times to Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. He had a right to pay no attention to it. To be accurate, that was not going to the verge. He had a right to pay no attention to Congress except to its confirmation of appointments. That does not even strain the Constitution. Will the Senator——

Mr. BURTON. I want to say to the Senator from Texas that I am going into no enumeration of them.

Mr. BAILEY. There is nothing of that kind to be enumerated.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator knows that President Cleveland oftentimes regarded it as incumbent upon him to go ahead, and he exercised certain powers without much regard for the action of Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. So that——

Mr. BURTON. This resolution will, under the circumstances, cast a reflection upon the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BURTON. Here on Saturday we disposed of a case involving a seat in this body. There have been rumors concerning the activity of the President in connection with it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I maintain that he not only did no more than his duty, but he would have been wanting if he had not taken any interest in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BURTON. I believe the Senator from Texas first had the floor to interrupt me.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I only wanted to say that when the Senator rises in his place and says a President of the United States has gone to the very verge of violating the Constitution he ought to be able to specify it. I was not a partisan of Mr. Cleveland within the party; in fact, I was a very young man in the House then and the very first one to break with him in the House of Representatives; but I do not believe any man ever occupied that great office who more religiously respected the Constitution of this Republic than Grover Cleveland did. I do not believe the Senator has a right in this place or elsewhere to treat a violation of the Constitution as a matter to be lightly regarded, and I think the Senator ought to be able to specify some case.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator knows very well that President Cleveland regarded it as incumbent upon him to take action in cases in which action is not usually taken except by authority of Congress. If I might repeat a private conversation of his I could state his opinion with reference to the relation between Congress and the President. I prefer not to do so, however. It was made on the very last day of his second term in a conversation with his successor.

Mr. BAILEY. Any association with the Senator from Ohio would beget that kind of opinion in the mind of any man judged by the way he expresses himself here.

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I did not care to interrupt the Senator from Ohio, but having in mind the same thought that was moving the Senator from Texas it does seem to me that when a member of this body makes such a serious statement reflecting upon the conduct of a President of the United States the Senator making the statement should be able to indicate the incident which justifies the statement made here.

Mr. BURTON. What does the Senator from New York say in regard to marching troops into Chicago and his action at the time of the railroad strike?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Is that the incident upon which the Senator from Ohio bases his charge that Grover Cleveland acted in defiance of the Constitution?

Mr. BURTON. I am simply asking the question.

Mr. O'GORMAN. It is the Senator from New York who is asking a question. If that is your justification for the statement reflecting upon the life and character of Grover Cleveland, I leave it to the judgment of the country as to whether the Senator has any justification for the assertion.

Mr. BURTON. I asked the Senator from New York a question, and I should like to have him answer it. I meant no reflection on Grover Cleveland. I expressly disclaimed anything of that kind. His strength as an Executive I admire.

Mr. O'GORMAN. And yet you have declared that as President he acted in disregard of constitutional limitations.

Mr. BURTON. He went to the very verge, I said.

Mr. O'GORMAN. You have indicated the only instance that justified that opinion.

Mr. BURTON. His general reputation for an extreme degree of independence as an Executive justified me, I think, in making the statement. I think both the Senator from New York and the Senator from Texas have been unduly aroused because of the statement I made, which meant no reflection whatever on the character of a Chief Magistrate for whom, although he belonged to another party, I had the greatest admiration.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with that constitutional provision which creates three separate and distinct departments of government—the legislative, executive, and judicial—and a Senate resolution commending that provision is always in order. But what object is to be obtained by this resolution? As I understand it, it is a protest by a majority of the Senate against coercion on the part of the Executive. It is equivalent to an admission on the part of Senators that they have been improperly influenced by the President and a demand that he shall cease such influence. They object to being coerced. The situation of Senators is quite like that of the bribe taker when he complains of the bribe giver. I can not understand how we can in sincerity and reason pass such a resolution as this, for we will thereby admit that we have been subject or are subject to improper Executive influence. If we are falling short of our full duty and full responsibility, it is certainly our own fault. One familiar with recent events must smile when he listens to complaints of Executive interference with a Congressman's duties. These complaints would indicate that the President was coercing Senators and Representatives into obeying his orders and forcing them to yield up their wills to his. But if we are to believe the newspaper reports national legislators are not waiting for presidential nominees to be elected in order to offer their services, but they are going to these nominees to find out what kind of legislation the candidates want in order that their desires may be fulfilled. It is not a case of yielding, but of voluntary surrender.

I submit, Mr. President, that we might better pass a resolution rededicating ourselves to our sworn duty. There can be no coercion if there is no one to coerce. Let the Senate, without fear or favor, perform its full duty and presidential influence will be ineffectual.

I am in hearty sympathy with the principle of noninterference by one department of government with another, but this resolution will not accomplish that condition. I think the letter from President Taft to Col. Roosevelt was an unwise and a foolish one to write, but I see nothing in it, nor has anything been produced which proves that improper influence was exerted by the President upon any Senator. Indeed, every Senator mentioned in that letter and every one who has spoken on this subject to-day has denied that the President attempted to influence him in the Lorimer matter, and certainly some of these Senators will not be accused of having so testified because of their friendship for the President. It seems to me as though we are asked to fire blank cartridges at an imaginary object. If any Senators know that they have been improperly influenced by the President let them first resolve to reform themselves before attempting to reform the Executive. The constitutional provision will not be strengthened by adopting the pending measure. I may not properly understand the true nature and object of this resolution, but it seems to me to be an attempt to shift responsibility for wrongdoing, if there be wrongdoing, from the Senate to the President. Presented as it is at this peculiar and particular time it is not accompanied with that presumption of disinterested good faith which should command support, and I shall therefore feel it to be my duty to vote against it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, if no stronger specific reasons can be presented for this resolution than those brought out in connection with the names of certain Members of the Senate in relation to speeches they may have made or conversation they may have had with President Taft in relation to the Lorimer matter, then it seems to me the resolution has very little indeed to justify it.

Others have mentioned what occurred between them and the President in relation to this testimony. My name happened to be connected with the letter, and I simply take the opportunity to say that, as others did, I procured a copy of the testimony from some member of the committee, from whom I can not now name, because I do not remember who it was; but I had a copy of the testimony before the holiday recess, and I remained in Washington during the holidays. I was here some two weeks, and had nothing else to do except to read that testimony, and I did so during that interval. I had read it and in a measure reread it, and made notes upon it, and had blocked out a speech I intended to make to the Senate analyzing it. After all that had been done incidentally I happened to be at the White House, and as a part of a general conversation on other matters the President expressed the wish that I might examine that testimony and take a keen interest in the case, because he thought it one of very great importance.

Now, do incidents of that kind justify a resolution like this, a resolution which implies that the Senate has become so helpless that it must put upon record something to apprise the country that it protests against being controlled by the President of the United States in casting its votes in this body? It seems to me we humiliate ourselves when we place upon the record here language of that kind.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator one question?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. How did it happen that the request to read the testimony was made only of those Senators who had a conviction on one side of the question?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I know nothing about that. I do not know anything as to how it came about with reference to other Senators, except as they have mentioned it here. I am simply stating how it occurred so far as I am concerned.

And, Mr. President, has it come to this, that when we go to the White House, when we are engaged in incidental conversation with the President of the United States, there must be a padlock on his mouth and a padlock on ours with reference to all public questions that are being considered in the legislative department?

I hope the relations between the legislative department of the Government and the Chief Executive may never be so stilted and so environed and so hedged about that we do not dare even to enter into a conversation with him freely and unrestrainedly about matters that may be pending here for fear we are placing ourselves under undue influence that may not only affect our votes in a general way by perhaps securing information that may be of assistance to us, but which may control our votes.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Would the Senator consider it a proper thing for the President of the United States to consult with a Senator as to what verdict he shall give upon the impeachment case we are about to enter upon the trial of?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not.

Mr. BACON. You do not think it would be proper?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not—to influence the verdict of a Senator in this case.

Mr. BACON. Very well. Is there any more serious impropriety involved in that than there would be in trying to influence a Senator as to what his vote should be in determining the right of a Senator to a seat in this body?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not understand, if the Senator will permit me, that the President of the United States undertook to influence any Member of the Senate in his judgment or in his conclusion.

Mr. BACON. I am not taking issue with the Senator upon that and I am not speaking of this concrete case, but I am making that inquiry of the Senator in view of the statement which just fell from his lips that there was no impropriety in the President talking with a Senator and trying to influence him about anything that pertained to his duties in this Chamber. That was practically what the Senator said.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Oh, no.

Mr. BACON. It was with a view to that that I asked the question about the impeachment trial.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I made no statement about the President seeking to influence Senators as to any conclusion. I granted that if the President should undertake to use his great power and patronage by holding a temptation of reward if votes were favorable before a Member of the Senate in order to secure that vote or to hold before him the punishment that might follow by refusing to recognize him in matters of that kind would be an offense; and if we have any offense of that kind to which we may address ourselves here, let us address ourselves to it. But no charge of that kind is laid at the door of the President. During the short time I have been in Washington I have never seen any evidence, so far as my personal experience goes, that any such influence as that has been exercised. I am not a special friend of the President; just now I am at a considerable distance from him politically; but fairness compels me to say that I have never observed in the slightest degree a disposition to exercise influence of that kind over Members of this body.

Mr. BACON. I want to say to the Senator, Mr. President, that my inquiry was not addressed as to what this particular President has done, but was addressed to the general statement which the Senator made as to what would be proper for a President of the United States to do in trying to influence a Senator as to his duties here—any President, not this President.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senator misunderstood me if he drew the conclusion that I was justifying any improper influence of any sort upon the part of the President on Members of the Senate; but I do say that general, free discussion, such as may occur between two citizens of this Republic anywhere in relation to public questions, is not an improper attempt to influence when they occur between the President of the United States and a Member of the Senate of the United States. If they are proper elsewhere, they are proper between these officials.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, replying to the statement just made by the Senator, I want to ask him to consider if that would be proper in the case of an impeachment trial?

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is a different thing entirely.

Mr. BACON. Why so?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am referring to open public questions that are in the forum for discussion; and I am referring to a discussion that would be proper, and admittedly proper, between a Senator and a private citizen. I say if proper between a Senator and a private citizen, the same discussion would be proper between the President and a Member of this body.

Mr. BACON. Even if it related to an impeachment trial?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I did not say that it would be proper for the Senator to go out and talk with John Doe on the street, discussing the weight of the testimony being heard here in an impeachment proceeding. If it would be, it would be just as proper if he conducted the conversation with the President of the United States.

Mr. BACON. I voted, as the Senator from South Dakota knows, against Mr. Lorimer's right to a seat, so that what I say can not be personal to that controversy; but I want the Senator, if he can do so, to differentiate between the gravity of the case of a Senator's right to his seat to be determined by the Members of the Senate, and the right of a judge to his office, to be determined by the Senate. What makes one any more sacred than the other?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am not differentiating in saying that, so far as the language of this conversation was concerned, there was no attempt in it, so far as it came within my experience, to use any influence whatever.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask whether the Senator approves the language of the President in the letter which has been read here, to the effect that he thought he was going to succeed in lining up the regular Republican Senators to oust Lorimer?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not. I knew nothing about that until I saw it in the letter.

Mr. BACON. That is the letter which was supposed to be considered in connection with it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am not discussing that part of it. I am simply discussing, so long as my name was connected with it, that particular feature of it, that part which was within my own experience; that is all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is the very gravamen of the case; it is the very center, as I consider it, of this whole case, that the President was engaged in "lining up" Members of the Senate who were to vote upon that important trial. Suppose he used that language in connection with this impeachment proceeding, suppose he had published a letter that he was engaged in lining up the Senators to vote one way or another on the impeachment proceeding, would not that be an evident invasion of the rights of the Senate?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have not undertaken to discuss the proprieties of this letter in any way, manner, shape, or form. I am simply discussing what occurred so far as it came within my knowledge between the President and myself as a Member of the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; but I ask the Senator, does not the letter reveal and demonstrate what it was that the President was actually doing? It is his own admission as to what he was doing.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think the Senator from Nebraska perhaps construes it as going further than I do; but I do not entirely justify such a letter.

Mr. President, I did not rise to indulge in any extended remarks in regard to this resolution. There is a jealousy, and there always has been jealousy, between the legislative and the executive departments. There is a jealousy between the legislative and the judicial departments. It is well that it is so; it is intended that it should be so, in order that each of these departments might be a check upon the other; but I dare say there is more truth than there is error in what has been read here this afternoon from the textbook written by the distinguished candidate of the Democratic Party for the Presidency—that it has probably been more often true that the legislative department has sought to trench upon the functions of the executive department than the Executive, in these later years, since Andrew Jackson's time, has undertaken to trench upon the legislative.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am ready to vote for any resolution that shall reassert the ancient independence of the Senate of the United States as against Executive usurpation of its functions or its rights. I am willing to vote for a resolution of that character that is entirely distinct and does not connect itself in any way with the Lorimer case. I asked for the amendment of the resolution offered by the Senator from Texas because I could see the danger of a misconstruction of the resolution if we applied it to cases other than those which were exclusively within the jurisdiction of the United States Senate. The word "improper" is not used; the words "improper powers and influence" are not used, but "the powers and influence of his great office."

The President has a right to recommend legislation, and I do not wish a resolution which shall say to me that I can not go to the President and receive his advice and instruction and information that he may have upon matter which he recommends or anything that he believes ought to be made a part of our legislation; but I can see a wide gulf between that and the recommendation or advice of the President upon a question of the right of a Senator to his seat in the Senate of the United States or upon the question of an impeachment trial. I can go to the President, and the President has a right to send for me, to influence me upon legislation which he thinks ought to be enacted; but he has no right, in my opinion, to suggest in any way, shape, or form what his conviction is upon a case like the trial of the right of a Senator to his seat in the United States Senate.

That is a judicial right, and I ought not to be influenced by his opinion. If he has evidence to give in any way, that evidence should come before the Senate and should be digested by the Senate; but the advice of the President should not be received. I am free to say that I think the President went a little outside of his functions as an Executive if he was exercising his influence in any way to line up Republicans on one side or the other; and I would not be his honest friend if I failed to say so.

But, Mr. President, we know that the wishes of the Executive do influence Senators. We saw its effect last year; we felt its effect in the preceding administration in its influence upon legislation far more than during the last administration. I should like to see the Senate more independent in that matter than it has been, and yet, at the same time, I would not advocate a resolution which should say that I can not go to the President, because by reason of his great office he may influence me upon legislation which he has a right to recommend to me in his annual messages.

I felt, therefore, that I should request that this resolution be so worded that it should relate only to those things which are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Senate and in which the Senate acts more in a judicial than in a legislative capacity. So, Mr. President, I think that the amendment ought to go in; but if anything is to be changed, the word "exclusively" might go out, though I should prefer that it should remain in the resolution.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, a few days ago, in an address I delivered in the Senate on the Lorimer case, I criticized the President for his action in connection with it. That criticism was based entirely upon the letter which the Senator from Texas has read and upon the statements made therein. It looks to me, however, as if that letter stated the matter possibly a little bit stronger than was actually the case, because those who have referred here to-day to their conversations with the President, it seems to me, have stated nothing that was improper on the part of the President. I think it is but fair that I should say that while I am not honored by being mentioned in the letter the Senator has read, I was spoken to by the President with reference to the matter; but the extent of that was simply this: As the Senator from South Dakota has stated with reference to his interview with the President, I was visiting the President in regard to some other matters, and when I got ready to leave the President asked me if I was considering the Lorimer case.

I told him yes, and he simply made the request that I should look into it very carefully, without asking me for my views or expressing his views, or anything of the sort. Now, I do not believe that that was improper, but it did seem to me——

Mr. BAILEY. What business was it of his whether you looked into it or not?

Mr. JONES. Well, I suppose he was simply interested as any citizen is interested in a matter of that importance.

Mr. BAILEY. Suppose you try that on a judge; suppose, as a citizen interested in a case in his court, you go and tell him that he ought to look into it, and see what will happen. He will put you in jail.

Mr. JONES. The President did not say that I ought to look into it; he said he hoped that I would do so; and that was the extent of it. I do not think there was anything wrong about that. There was no suggestion——

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will permit me, the President explains in this letter exactly why he was soliciting Senators. He says, "I want to win."

Mr. JONES. I condemn the President for that letter absolutely; I am simply relating this as merely a statement of what occurred between the President and myself, which, if it had gone no further, I do not really consider would have been improper. I did condemn the President the other day upon the statements made in that letter, which indicate that he went much further with others possibly than he did with me.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senator said a moment ago that the President merely did it as any other good citizen, and I suggested that if the Senator tried the same experiment on a judge, the judge would not regard that as advice tendered by a good citizen; the judge would regard that as a contempt of his court, especially if you were to follow the suggestion with a statement, such as the President made, and tell the judge you wanted to win that case. The President was not asking the Senator to examine it out of a mere general, indefinite interest in it; he was asking the Senator to examine it because he wanted to win that case, although he was not a party to the record, and had absolutely no right to intervene.

Mr. JONES. As I have said before, in my conversation with the President there was nothing of the kind indicated in the letter here. Of course, if there had been anything of that kind said, I think I should have resented it at once; but I did not consider the suggestion that the President made, so far as it went with me, as anything improper, and I do not think so yet; but the statement in the letter of the President indicates, of course, that he went much further with others.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington if he knew, either by anything that was said by the President or otherwise, whether the President was for or against Mr. Lorimer at that time?

Mr. JONES. I did not. The President did not indicate to me what his views were or as to whether he had any views.

Mr. WORKS. And the Senator had no knowledge from any other source?

Mr. JONES. I did not.

Mr. WORKS. According to the statement of the President himself, he was trying to "line up" Senators, and they, in their innocence, were not aware of it.

Mr. BAILEY. But he did line up all with whom he talked, his way.

Mr. JONES. I desire to suggest that possibly the President may have gone farther with some than he did with me, because I have stated all that occurred with reference to my conversation with him in regard to this matter.

I desire simply to say further, Mr. President, that when this resolution was first presented I felt like voting for it; in fact, I said to some Members of the Senate that I expected to vote for it; but, on reflection, I am inclined to think that the best course for the Senate and for Senators to take is to show by their action that they do not propose to be influenced by attempts of the Executive to influence them in any of these matters; that it will not impress the country with our opposition to Executive interference by simply passing a resolution condemning the President for trying to influence us; but, if by our action as Senators and as a Senate we show to the country that we are not influenced by Executive interference, there will not be very much Executive interference or attempts at interference upon the part of the Executive.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me to say that it is not enough for a man to show by his conduct that he is not improperly influenced? He owes it to his self-respect to say that he resents every effort to improperly influence him. Our courts would fall into universal contempt if our judges would allow men to come to their chambers in an effort to influence their judgments without regard to the law or the evidence, and then throw their cloaks about them and say, "I did not send the man to jail, although he insulted me and offered me a bribe; but I showed him that I was above it." That is not sufficient.

Mr. JONES. I desire to say to the Senator from Texas that if I had thought the President of the United States had tried to influence me either for or against Senator Lorimer, I would have resented it; but I did not then, and I do not now, consider that he tried to do so, unless possibly the matter is viewed in connection with the letter which the Senator has read, because, as I have stated to the Senator from California, I did not know what the views of the President were in regard to the case and he did not indicate them to me one way or the other. He did not ask me for my views or anything of the sort, but simply, as I was going out, suggested that I look into the matter very carefully.

I will say, in line with some suggestion, I think, made by the Senator from Idaho, that there was an impression at the time the committee made its report—the report being very nearly unanimous—that the Senate might pass upon the matter without any particular discussion. I remember hearing it said that it was the usual custom of the Senate in election cases of this kind, where the report was unanimous, as a matter of course to accept the report, and while this report was not unanimous, it was so nearly so that some suggested that it might pass in the same way. I am not so sure but that possibly the President had heard something of that sort, and that he probably thought it was a matter of so much importance that the Senate ought not to pass upon it in that way.

While, of course, he ought to assume that we would do our duty, yet I did not consider it improper for the President, in an important matter of that kind, simply to express the hope that we look into the matter very carefully.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, the Senator's excuse for the President makes it apparent that the President was trying to influence the action of the Senate in a matter committed exclusively to the Senate.

Mr. JONES. I did not say that the President was acting from those motives. I say, while that is possibly the reason he made the suggestion to me——

Mr. BAILEY. He said so in his speech.

Mr. JONES. As I have said, I condemned the President in my speech the other day because of the statement made in that letter, and I have no excuse for the President acting along the line suggested in that letter.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator believe that the Senate of the United States, with this letter of the President before it in the most formal way, because the President not only used it in a public speech, but the Senate itself has made that speech a public document—yet with all of this in its archives showing that the President not only sent for Senators and tried to talk to Senators about this matter, but that he also wrote a letter in which he said he was trying to "line up" Senators; that he "wanted to win"; and that he was afraid the Senate would not do its duty with reference to the report—with that kind of information a part of the records of the Senate, does the Senator think the Senate of the United States can preserve the respect of the people and pass it sub silentio?

Mr. JONES. As I have stated, I should vote for the resolution as originally introduced by the Senator from Texas, but as modified I am not inclined to support it.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the Senator is right, because we have nowhere in our records, whatever we may have floating through the air and in our minds as rumors, any proof that the President has ever attempted to interfere with the functions of the Senate except in this particular case, and I am absolutely certain we ought to confine it to this particular case.

But I yielded because I thought it was so vital that the Senate declare its resentment against Executive influence that I yielded in the hope that we might get a practically unanimous vote. However, I want to say to the Republican stalwarts or the Republican regulars, as the President calls them, that if they are not willing to do that, then we will see if we can not pass the resolution as originally introduced.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I said before, I would much rather vote for the resolution as originally proposed than with the amendments which have been suggested. I am firmly of the opinion that really the best way for us to assert ourselves in this matter is to show not only as individual Senators, but as a Senate, that we are not going to allow Executive interference, rather than by passing resolutions and then going on just as we have been doing in the past.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am in favor of the pending resolution because it declares a correct and vital principle. It does not matter very much to me whether it reflects upon somebody or not, because if it does so it can only reflect upon the President, because he has violated that principle.

Senators whose names have been mentioned in connection with this matter say unqualifiedly that they have not been influenced; that they did not even realize that the President was attempting to influence their action; but the President must be judged by what he himself has said. His letter shows exactly what his purpose was. He says in so many words that he was attempting to line up the Senators, the Members of this body, against Mr. Lorimer, and that he was attempting by that means to win.

Now why should we hesitate with respect to this matter in passing this resolution because it may reflect upon the President when we consider what he himself has said with respect to it? This is an extreme case just because it was not ordinary legislation. It was a matter which was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Senate, a matter over which the President had no control, with which he had no right to deal in any way whatever.

Therefore when we reach that point in the administration of the affairs of this Government where the President of the United States openly confesses that he has attempted to influence the Senate of the United States with respect to a vital matter of that kind, I think it is about time the Senate should take action if it does amount to a rebuke of the President of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the words "within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Senate" and inserting "relating solely to the duties of Senators."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the words "within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Senate," and in lieu thereof to insert "relating solely to the duties of Senators."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt. The Chair will again put the question.

Mr. BAILEY. Let the amendment be again reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the words "within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Senate" and in lieu thereof to insert "relating solely to the duties of Senators," so that if amended the resolution will read:

Resolved, That any attempt on the part of a President of the United States to exercise the powers and influence of his great office for the purpose of controlling the vote of any Senator upon a question involving the right to a seat in the Senate or any other matter relating solely to the duties of Senators would violate the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution, and invade the rights of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Texas as amended. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. BURTON. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE]. I do not see him in the Chamber, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey (when the name of Mr. CURTIS was called). I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. SHIVELY (when Mr. KERN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. KERN] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber. He is paired with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). Owing to a general pair which I have with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM], I withhold my vote. If he were present, I would vote "yea."

Mr. OLIVER (when Mr. PENROSE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. PENROSE] is absent from the city and is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. If my colleague were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] is unavoidably absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. If my colleague were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. SANDERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. If I were at liberty, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer the pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], who is detained from the city. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. If he were here and I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I see he is not present, and I therefore withhold my vote. Were I at liberty I would vote "nay."

Mr. BRADLEY. I am paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BROWN] is paired with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WATSON] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS]. If the Senator from West Virginia were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BAILEY. Notwithstanding my pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON], I have voted; and I desire the RECORD to show that I did that in accordance with an understanding with him on this particular question.

Mr. JONES. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber. If he were present I do not know how he would vote on this question.

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber. If he were present and at liberty to vote he would vote "nay." He is paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA.]

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—35.

So Mr. BAILEY's resolution as amended was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to take up House bill 25069, the sundry civil appropriation bill, immediately after the routine business in the morning.

IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, yesterday, in what seemed to be the orderly course of procedure, I introduced a resolution providing for the appointment of a special committee to which should be referred the message and resolution from the House of Representatives in regard to the impeachment proceedings. There was no debate upon the subject at the time; it went through evidently without consideration; but afterwards a difference of opinion developed in the Chamber, some thinking that a committee of that sort was entirely unnecessary and others believing that the time of appointment was inopportune. Therefore, in order that the matter may be before the Senate again, I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution was carried.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, Senators perhaps are not familiar with the necessity for such a committee, or yesterday did not fully realize the questions that will come up from time to time as we go on that ought to be looked after and planned and resolutions drawn. It would be a great economy of time if this committee should be left in existence. I hope the Senate will retain it.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I wish to join in the hope that the committee may be allowed to stand as originally ordered by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate yesterday adopted the resolution submitted by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

The motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

TARIFF DUTIES ON WOOL.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow after the routine morning business, if I can get recognition from the Chair, I shall move to take up House bill 22195, to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened and (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 17, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 16, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Spirit, the Father of men, through whom Thou hast poured wisdom, knowledge, strength, and purity in the ages, making the world bright with Thy presence; make us one with Thee in intent and purpose, that we may apply our knowledge unto wisdom, our strength unto purity, and thus reflect in our personality the likeness of our Maker. "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is." For thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6084) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that Mr. OVERMAN had been appointed a conferee on the bill (H. R. 24023) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, in place of Mr. FOSTER, excused.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following order:

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate is now organized for the trial of articles of impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, United States circuit judge, and is ready to receive the managers on the part of the House at its bar.

COMMERCIAL STATISTICS.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to incorporate therein an address by Mr. Oscar L. Austin, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, containing certain valuable and nonpartisan statistics of the Government with reference to our commercial development.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON. I did not hear the gentleman's statement as to what it related to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I desire to incorporate as a part of my remarks an address made by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, bringing certain valuable and nonpartisan commercial statistics down to date.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection.

Mr. FINLEY. What is the length of the matter which the gentleman desires to print?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It will take about three pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TRAVELERS' BAGGAGE.

Mr. PETERS, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the bill (H. R. 24926) to amend paragraph 709 of section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report (No. 1005) ordered to be printed.

ARKANSAS & MEMPHIS RAILWAY BRIDGE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 17239) to authorize the Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman would explain the effect of the amendment and the reason for it.

Mr. McKELLAR. This is a bridge bill for a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis. The House passed the bill some time in March and it went to the Senate. Since that time, I have been informed, there has been a virtual agreement between the city of Memphis and the county of Crittenden, on the other side of the river, in the State of Arkansas, and the railroad company which is to build the bridge, in reference to the approaches, by which agreement the local authorities are to contribute $50,000 for the building of the approaches to the bridge. It is practically an agreed matter between the local authorities, and I hope the House will concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the bill give the public the right to use the bridge?

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the gentleman mean a free bridge?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; it is not a free bridge.

Mr. ROBINSON. In addition to contributing the $50,000, the public is required to pay tolls?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; it is to be a toll bridge.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the reason, if the public is required to contribute to the construction, that the terminal company is permitted to charge tolls?

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand it, the railroad company desires to build a railroad bridge, and it will cost $400,000 or $500,000 additional to make it a general-traffic bridge. Naturally, the company does not care to build a general-traffic bridge. On the other hand, it will be of the greatest advantage to the city of Memphis and the people of Arkansas as well, especially to Crittenden County, to have a general-traffic bridge.

The railroad company is willing to build a general-traffic bridge, but it objects to building the long approach which is necessary on the Arkansas side. As a matter of fact, as the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is probably familiar with the situation, on the Arkansas side there is a good deal of low ground, and it is over this that the fight has been for quite a while, as the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] undoubtedly has seen in the Memphis papers. The city of Memphis has agreed to bear a large portion of the $50,000 additional expense that the local authorities are to contribute in order to get a general-traffic bridge. It is largely a question of local importance and convenience.

Mr. ROBINSON. Can the gentleman state whether the county of Crittenden has taken any official action in reference to the matter, or has the agreement been reached by parties purporting to represent the county?

Mr. McKELLAR. Senator CLARKE had a letter from the county judge of Crittenden County saying that it will be satisfactory as the best they could get. Of course, I would greatly prefer that we should have a free bridge and approaches built free; but, as a matter of fact, this seems to be the best we can do under the circumstances, and we think that a general-traffic bridge at this time will be of great benefit, both to the city of Memphis and to the other side of the river, and I am anxious that the bill should pass.

Perhaps the bridge company should pay for the approaches just as provided in the House bill; but it must be admitted that the purpose of the company was simply to build a railroad bridge, and that a railroad bridge merely will be of the greatest value to both Tennessee and Arkansas. And, of course, if we can get, in addition to the railroad bridge, a general-traffic bridge it will be of vastly more importance and benefit to us. After the House bill was passed not only requiring the railroad company to build a separate general-traffic compartment to the bridge at an additional expense of several hundred thousand dollars, but also requiring it to build the long approach on the Arkansas side, the railroad people gave notice that they would not build any bridge at all. So since that time the House bill has simply been lying in the Senate awaiting developments. Recently Mayor E. H. Crump, Mr. C. P. J. Mooney, Mr. T. K. Riddick, Mr. L. P. Berry, Judge Allen Hughes, Judge Frank Smith, Judge Thompson, Mr. Louis Barton, Mr. Lem Banks, and other public-spirited citizens of both Memphis and Crittenden County got together with the representatives of the railroad company—Gen. Luke Wright, Mr. L. P. Miles, Mr. B. L. Mallory, and Mr. Tinsman—and agreed substantially to what is now contained in the bill as amended. All of these gentlemen deserve the greatest credit for their work, and if the bridge is built, as I believe it will be now, it will be due most largely to their splendid efforts. All the Memphis newspapers, too, have given powerful and effective aid to the project. The amendment was drawn by Senator CLARKE of Arkansas, and the Senate passed the bill with this amendment. After consulting with Senator CLARKE I am convinced that the bill can not pass the Senate in any other form and that a conference committee could do no good. I feel sure that the bill as amended will now meet the approval of both the railroad company and those who want the general-traffic bridge, as every material difference has been adjusted, and therefore I hope the House will agree to the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, this bill was reported originally to the House from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and was supposed to meet all the requirements of railroad traffic and highway traffic, if there might be any. There was a report by the Secretary of War that it would not interfere with navigation. The bill has not been referred back to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and so Members have not examined it; but it seems to be a local matter in which the people of Crittenden County are interested, and I see no reason why the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce would object to agreeing to the Senate amendment if it meets with the approval of the people who will have to put up the money.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, Crittenden County is not situated within the district which I represent, but I am now informed that Senator CLARKE, of the State of Arkansas, who has the bill in charge in the Senate, has agreed to the amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the gentleman that Senator CLARKE, from the State of Arkansas, prepared and offered the amendment which was passed in the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection whatever under those circumstances.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

ANNA R. SCHLEY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 4568) granting an increase of pension to Anna R. Schley, with a House amendment disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi, and Mr. WOOD of New Jersey.

COAL MINING IN WYOMING.

The SPEAKER laid before the House Senate joint resolution 100, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to permit the continuation of coal mining operations on certain lands in Wyoming, with a House amendment disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to further insist upon the House amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, this resolution as it came from the Senate provided that the Secretary of the Interior should have general authority to permit coal mining and the leasing of coal mines. The House amendment, as I recall it, restricted that to a particular case. Am I not right about that?

Mr. ROBINSON. The Interior Department suggested that the legislation should be general.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the House agreed to the proposition to apply it to a particular case for the reason stated. I shall not object to its going to conference, and I hope there is no disposition on the part of the House conferees to extend that position and make it general.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I find on looking at the bill that my recollection is correct. The Senate declined to report a bill of a general character and confined the measure to the Owl Creek Coal Co. The House amended the Senate resolution but did not adopt the suggestion of the Interior Department.

Mr. MANN. Then I was mistaken in it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. MONDELL.

ALLOTTEES, FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES, OKLAHOMA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 4948) to amend an act approved May 27, 1908, entitled "An act for the removal of restrictions from part of the lands of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes," with House amendment thereto disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman from Texas would tell us some of the differences.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will state that this was a Senate bill. We had a similar House bill pending before the committee. We adopted the House bill. The bill was introduced by Mr. DAVENPORT, the gentleman from Oklahoma, and I will ask that he explain the matter.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Speaker, the bill has for its purpose the clearing up of the question down there between the Federal and State courts on the one side and the United States Attorney General's office on the other. The act of May 27, 1908, provided that where full-blood Indians inherited lands from deceased allottees the county court, the probate court of the county, having jurisdiction of the estate, should approve the conveyance made by the full blood before it should become valid. The Federal court in Oklahoma and the State court passing upon the question held that if the allottee died before May 27, 1908, and the conveyance was made subsequent to that time, the conveyance was valid, if approved by the county court. The Attorney General of the United States took a different position, and this bill is intended to correct that and clarify the matter so that the titles will be clear.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, I remember the bill well. My understanding was the gentleman in charge of the bill at the time the change was made by the House stated it was agreeable to them and to the Senators who were interested in it. Why does it come back to the House with this disagreement to the House amendment as it was passed by unanimous consent with a change that was made and agreed to here?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I can not understand, but the Senate refused to agree to the amendment and asked for a conference.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I was in the Senate at the time and Senator SMOOT suggested that it go to conference and the amendment be presented there.

Mr. MANN. And for the purpose of putting in a new proposition. We understood here and had the right to understand, as so stated by the gentleman, that if the House agreed to the form it was in the Senate was going to agree to it.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I will say to the gentleman I was not on the floor of the House at the time the bill passed and I do not know what the understanding was at the time, but I do know that the amendment offered is an amendment to conform in substance to the act of May 27, 1908, and it ought to be carried in the bill because there should be some authority to approve the conveyances. As it stands it does not require anybody to approve the conveyances and there should be a provision in the bill requiring some court to approve the conveyances before they become valid.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House insist on its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, Mr. GUDGER, and Mr. BURKE of South Dakota.

SALE OF FUTURES IN COTTON.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the bill (H. R. 56) which is being considered under the five-minute rule. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 56) to prohibit interference with commerce among the States and Territories and with foreign nations, and to remove obstructions thereto, and to prohibit the transmission of certain messages by telegraph, telephone, cable, or other means of communication between States and Territories and foreign nations.

Be it enacted, etc., That certain words used in this act and in proceedings pursuant hereto shall, unless the same be inconsistent with the context, be construed as follows: The word "message" shall mean any communication by telegraph, telephone, wireless telegraph, cable, or other means of communication from one State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia or to any foreign country. The word "person" shall mean any person, partnership, joint stock company, society, association, or corporation, their managers and officers, and when used with reference to the commission of acts which are herein required or forbidden shall include persons who are participants in the required or forbidden acts, and the agents, officers, and members of the boards of directors and trustees, or other similar controlling or directing bodies of partnerships, joint stock companies, societies, associations, and corporations. And words importing the plural number, wherever used, may be applied to or mean only a single person or thing, and words importing the singular number may be applied to or mean several persons or things.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. This is another of the nostrums that legislative quack doctors in and out of this Chamber are seeking to administer to the people from time to time. It is heralded here as a great boon and benefaction to the cotton grower of the South. I venture to predict if by any mischance it should become a law it will prove a worse blow to the cotton industry than even the boll weevil which has devastated our country. One of the cotton exchanges which is sought to be destroyed by this bill is located in my home city. I say the New Orleans Cotton Exchange has been the best friend that the southern farmer has had, and if you destroy it by this bill you make of King Cotton the vassal of Liverpool. That institution, Mr. Speaker, is an honestly conducted institution. It is a legitimate institution. Its methods have been scrutinized by Government authorities and its contracts and general operations have been approved by the present Commissioner of Corporations, Herbert Knox Smith, and I submit to attempt to destroy it by this legislation is a serious mistake. We are told that we should support this bill in the interest of morality and because of a party platform. Well, under the circumstances, with pseudo morality and blanket party platforms on the one side and the Constitution of the United States on the other I choose to take my stand with the Constitution. This bill is distinctly in the teeth of the Constitution. Any man who has read the case of Leland and Ware in Two hundred and ninth United States, decided less than five years ago, must come to the conclusion that it is violative of the fundamental law.

The object of the legislation is pernicious, the bill itself is unconstitutional, and I shall certainly vote against it. And in this connection I ask to read the following excerpt from a telegram received to-day by me:

The cotton producers have had enough adversity to contend with without being assassinated at the hands of their alleged political friends. I want the farmers—the ones who make the cotton, not the ones who make the speeches—to be fully advised of the economic significance of this legislation in order that they may fix responsibility should calamity unhappily befall.

Mr. BURLESON. Whom is the telegram from?

Mr. DUPRÉ. It is from W. B. Thompson, with whom you are well acquainted.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange?

Mr. DUPRÉ. Formerly president of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange; yes.

I herewith insert the telegram of Mr. Thompson, to which I have referred heretofore in part. The telegram is as follows:

Hon. H. GARLAND DUPRÉ,
Washington, D. C.:

The Beall anticotton futures bill, if enacted, will strike southern prosperity the severest blow it has sustained in many years. It is admitted that some regulation of future trading is needed, but the bill in question is drastic and destructive. To informed or open minds it has been demonstrated that the proposed legislation would prevent American merchants from hedging their spot purchases and sales, and would destroy the American contract exchanges. The inevitable results of such conclusion would be, first, to deprive the cotton producer of the multitude of small competitive markets and buyers which now purchase crop, and in consequence summarily lower the price of cotton; and, secondly, to place the price-making power unreservedly in the hands of a combination of foreign buyers and spinners, who would unquestionably fix it low. I have no interest in the matter except as a citizen of the cotton-producing country who wants to see the commodity bring the highest legitimate price. I have made an earnest study of this question, and I can, with some claim to authority and with the support of absolute conviction, warn the advocates of this bill that if they make it a law they will legislate directly against the price of cotton, and consequently against the welfare of the South. The cotton producers have had enough adversity to contend with without being assassinated by the hands of their alleged political friends. I want the farmers—the ones who make the cotton, not the ones who make the speeches—to be fully advised of the economic significance of this legislation in order that they may fix responsibility should calamity unhappily befall.

W. B. THOMPSON.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest, as I always do, to my friend the able Member from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ]. I do not agree with what he has said. The exchange may be good for some of his constituents—those who operate it. The cotton exchanges as operated to-day are very injurious to the cotton producers that I represent, injurious to every cotton producer in the United States.

This bill is in the interest of fair play. It is for the purpose of requiring cotton exchanges to perform their rightful and legitimate functions in the cotton world. What is the purpose of the cotton exchange, or should be the function of the exchange? It should benefit the producer of cotton. It should help to sell and distribute the cotton crop. Does it do that now? No. Mr. Speaker, as conducted to-day it utterly fails to do that. It deals in a fictitious stuff called cotton, and sells that stuff in unlimited quantities and real cotton is injured by these sales, because real cotton is not required to settle the contracts. They use the word "cotton" in their contracts, but they do not deliver cotton on their contracts. They have no cotton. They do not want any cotton, for it does not require cotton to do the kind of business that they do.

Mr. Speaker, I characterized once before this dealing in cotton as a "dummy performance." A gentleman illustrated to me what he meant by a "dummy saloon." He said, "They sell whisky on Sunday, but in order to sell a drink of whisky they must serve a sandwich with each drink, a sandwich composed of two slices of bread with one piece of red meat in the middle. The bartender discovered that instead of having to go to the baker and butcher for bread and meat he could have some wooden sandwiches painted like brown bread with a red slice painted like meat in the middle; and on Sunday he would put the sandwich on the table when a man would order a drink. In this way these wooden sandwiches were served over and over to thousands of men."

That is the way they do on the cotton exchange. They keep the same old dog-tail cotton and serve it with contracts on which they expect a settlement in money and not in cotton. The man who bought the dummy cotton contract on the exchange did not want the stuff sold him any more than the fellow who bought the whisky wanted the dummy sandwich. They put this exchange cotton back and serve it to you, and to you, and thousands of others. They settle the difference in dollars and dimes. No cotton is demanded, and the farmer is outraged and outlawed by this awful practice. The Scripture tells us that if you sow the wind you will reap the whirlwind. I wish to say that the cotton exchange sells the wind and the cotton farmer reaps the whirlwind. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, this open and notorious gambling in cotton is the greatest evil that the cotton producers have to contend with. [Applause.]

Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I shall support this bill for more reasons than one. I have some acquaintance with the cotton business. I have been all my life a cotton producer. I have been a compress man. I have partly owned, I presume, one of the largest ginneries east of the Mississippi River. I have bought and sold cotton for domestic and foreign accounts, and, also, I have climbed that tree of knowledge which so many have climbed, and I have done some apple eating long ago.

If there is any good in those unbridled institutions—the so-called exchanges and bucket shops—it remains for me to discover it. I have before me some figures here that are somewhat astounding. I find that the city of New Orleans some few years ago—the nearest I could get, because as you know, they no longer publish daily the number of bales sold, either spot or future—received 2,296,971 bales of cotton. At the end of the season it had left only 31,964 bales. The city or port of Galveston received 3,891,695 bales and had 30,820 on hand at the close of the season; the city of Savannah 1,668,633 bales, and it had left only 8,593 bales.

It remains for me to recite a problem for mathematical calculation that I would like to have solved by some Member of this House. The same year the port of New York received 23,108 bales. It sold 90,000,000, and at the end of the season it had left over 169,975 bales—receiving 23,298 and having left over 169,975 bales.

There is no planter, no farmer, who objects to any institution—not a so-called exchange, but one of legitimate purpose and action—for the exchange of cotton. It is for that purpose that they are presumably in existence. If I have a thousand bales and you have the money, you being a spinner and I being a producer, it is perfectly legitimate for you by wire or any other means (which this bill does not prevent) to negotiate a transaction through a broker or in any other way to accomplish the end desired.

But how is it with the usual practice—of some of these institutions, at least? There is no intent or purpose attached to the supposed negotiation when made. As long as Mr. Jones could stand up and say, "I buy," and Mr. Brown could muster his forces and say, "I sell," there stood the producer and the manufacturer confounded in mind, confused, knowing not what the result might be, knowing that in some cotton exchanges, and especially the latter one referred to a moment ago, the transactions carried on were in no sense bona fide, but represented only that instinct of gambling which so largely prevails in the human race. I say "gambling" with no invidious reference to anyone who, consciously or unconsciously, is doing this great injustice to the people who raise this great staple, but, nevertheless, my friends, it is nothing but gambling.

In some of the institutions mentioned the vast volume of cotton received and the small amounts remaining at the close of the season but indicate the sincerity that prevails; and the millions of bales by them or through them as a medium disposed of lend to a great degree the sentiment of approval in the transactions which are consummated through them as a means of bringing the consumer and the producer together for the exchange of cotton and not wind. [Applause.]

It was once said by a distinguished friend of mine in my native county that you could not spin wind. There are men on the cotton exchange to-day, I doubt not, who have never seen one bale of cotton unless it was some first bales shipped from somewhere—a premium bale, the first gathered for the season—who would not know a package of that staple if they met it in the road. Yet these meet around the ring in this exchange, and one says, "I bet that such and such a month will bear a middling price of so much." The other accepts the challenge and bets that it will not be worth that much. That is called one selling and one buying. Upon this is predicated largely, in the cotton world, the price of that great staple for that day.

Thus these speculators by themselves are dominated by a sole opinion obedient to the gambling instinct which in them lies, and whichever can marshal the strongest force of aiders and abettors dominates the market in put and call regardless of the existence of the material substance itself. During these transactions not one fiber more or less is brought into existence or is destroyed in earth, yet we see as a result the property which belongs to others emasculated in price and the hardships resultant from these transactions brought to the homes, the firesides, the schools of this land which educate and erect the standards of civilization in the youth of the land, and poverty and woe is the heritage of him who in the sweat of his brow produced these commodities and he must bend beneath the burden which the heartlessness of these transactions heaps upon his shoulders, requiring him, Atlaslike, to bear the onus of America's commercial world to a great extent.

I am likewise in sympathy with our brethren North and West engaged in the grain business, who are made the victims of avarice and are held beneath the heels of those whose greed for gain and gold admits no conscience into the temple of their souls nor sympathy for those who toil that they may reap. I shall vote with my brethren of the West when their bill, identical with the one which is pending, bearing the name of my friend BEALL of Texas, is presented, and with voice and influence will, to the extent of my ability, promote the accomplishment of all that their measure demands and needs.

To give an illustration of the unsettled and unsettling conditions attaching to these fictitious market values by gambling made, I recall in 1894 or 1895, in the month of January or February, July cotton about the ring sold and fluctuated from 17.55, then 13.02—$20 a bale in a single month. But when July came cotton sold at 10.18, a difference of $37.50 a bale. Yet the hand and wand of no magician had snatched from existence one single bale nor with a magic of mystery had taken from existence and being one fiber of cotton. In the six or seven months' speculation they had taken from him who toils and exchanged the locus of the value thereof to the pocket of him who, in Scriptural language, "toils not, neither does he spin."

This commodity did not belong to them—neither to him who sold nor to him who bought. It belonged to him who produced it and on which he predicated his hopes for physical existence, for the education and maintenance of family and fireside. Can there be justification therefor? I think not.

Thus this cotton, this dog-tail, this spook cotton, raised on Kirk Alloway farm, stands ever as a menace to the true merit of that staple which alike shelters the bodies of mankind and adorns the human race.

When our friend says on the exchange to the other, "I will sell," and the other says, "I will buy," what substance is there to put up, either to be bought or sold? It is a barter of opinion, pure and simple. It is a bet against time and tide, wind and weather, by those who, like the child of fortune, homeless and wandering, floating upon the face of circumstance, aimlessly drifts on the sea of luck. The world is no gainer, whichever wins; the world receives no increment of value as the result of the transaction with him who has lost.

But, on the other hand, the spinner, by a large majority, objects to this modus operandi; there is no basis for his calculations. He knows not to-day what to-morrow will bring forth, though the quantity of cotton in existence may be approximately certainly known. The farmer knows equally as little and consequently is the sufferer, for in the hazard and risk of these processes of gambling the spinner buys with a margin to secure the risk of a probable loss, and the farmer stands that subtraction from the sum of his efforts through that year.

If these fictitious transactions did not exist and the media for their promotion included not the assistance of the great mail and other facilities for the transmission of information and the abolition by force of law of all transactions that carried not with them the intent to fulfill, the spinner would receive that which he needs to spin and weave—not money—and the farmer would transfer for a legitimate price, placed upon the basis of supply and demand, and receive recompense for his labor without sustaining the speculative world in fiction and fancy as he leans upon his hoe, which, phantom like, follows him from furrow to home, guards him through the night with haunt and dread that poverty result, and from the transactions about these rings of delusion will drive his progeny from school, the sheriff to his door, and himself to an earlier grave.

I have no objection to a legitimate exchange where cotton can be exchanged from producer to consumer. I would not thwart one transaction or effort upon the part of these institutions where honesty of intent and purpose lie behind every transaction, for it is not necessary in the legitimate exchange of commodities between men that either must suffer. Frequently it is beneficial, and oftener than not in the transactions of trade both parties thereto are beneficiaries. He who has the command of the commodity indeed needs the consumer's money. The consumer has the money, but needs the cotton, the wheat, the grain, the rye, and getting it his mills roll on, his business flourishes; he has profited, as has the man "who leans upon the hoe" and gazes upon the ground.

In a hearing before the Agricultural Committee a few years ago, and I quote this from some remarks submitted by Judge SIMS of Tennessee, in whose good judgment I have great confidence, and whose integrity all men recognize, in a colloquy with Mr. MacColl, then the president of the New England Spinners' Association, asked the following question:

Mr. SIMS. I would like to have you define what you mean by the term "speculation."

Mr. MACCOLL. I think that it is very well understood that there is a large number of people connected with the speculation in cotton, raising and depressing the price.

Mr. SIMS. Professional operators?

Mr. MACCOLL. Yes.

Then again, he says:

Mr. MACCOLL. My opinion is that the spinners of this country have used the future market to a very small extent. Lately they have been forced to use it more, but they have not used it to any large extent in years gone by.

Further, and I call strictly your attention to this:

Mr. MACCOLL. There are thousands and thousands of manufacturers who have never bought a bale of futures.

Mr. SIMS. Is it not a fact that the speculators are divided into bulls and bears and that the effect of their operations is nil?

Mr. MACCOLL. If there is no evil in it, it is not worth while for us to waste time about it. We think it has been a tremendous evil in the last three or four years.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, with the president of the great association of spinners of America, with the great mass of thousands multiplied of producers of cotton opposing the fiction in the trade, opposing gambling in the fleecy products of the fields of the South, what else is left for us to do? With only those about the cities, adorned by the towering palaces of America's wealthier classes, clamoring for the continued existence of these life-stealing and heart-breaking institutions in nefarious business engaged, I say there is not contained here anything which in good conscience would prevent my casting my ballot in favor of this measure.

This bill seeks to destroy no cotton exchange, it seeks to interfere with no legitimate transaction where the integrity of intent and purpose are unquestionable for the delivery of the commodity bought and the commodity sold, but it aims to strike down that burden which tends to destroy the value of the world's greatest fiber product. Sixty-six and four-tenths per cent of the cotton of the world is raised in America. The balance is scattered in almost all civilized lands. British India, with the assistance of the imperial treasury of England, raises only 14.9 per cent of the remainder. Egypt, under the domination of Great Britain, produces 6.5. Russia, stretching from Persia to the Arctic, from the city of St. Peter to the Peaceful Sea, produces only 3.1; Brazil, 2.2; and all other lands 2.6 per cent. And yet we, holding a monopoly by reason of conditions climatic, latitudinal, and the peculiar consistency of our soils, propose to permit the destruction of the value of this great commodity, whose tiny fiber binds in indissoluble union the commerce of this country with that of all nations of earth, and the value of which, whatever it may be proclaimed, is written in every language the globe about expressive of value.

Therefore I, for one, Mr. Chairman, am opposed to my Government, directly or by indirection, affording any aid or comfort to those who would strike it down by act of law or the deed of the lawless, and I am opposed to seeing any function of our Government being made a medium of aid and comfort to those who destroy the intrinsic value of that commodity to express the worth of which I could name the entire budget of the Nation almost and write it in letters that would be expressive of a billion dollars. [Applause.]

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that all debate on this paragraph close in five minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Make it close now.

Mr. RUBEY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will move that the debate on this paragraph close now.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to a proposition in this paragraph.

Mr. RUBEY. I will make it five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] moves that all debate on this paragraph close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. The definition provided in the first section of the bill for the word "message," that it shall mean any communication by telegraph, telephone, wireless telegraph, cable, or other means of communication, covers a very wide latitude, and certainly it would cover the mail. Section 3 of the bill provides:

That it shall be the duty of any person sending any message relating to a contract or to the making of a contract for future delivery of cotton to furnish to the person transmitting such message an affidavit that he is the owner of such cotton, and that he has the intention to deliver such cotton.

Under these two provisions of the bill, if a man wants to write a letter proposing to deliver cotton to an actual purchaser in the future, he must file an affidavit with the clerk of the post office, or some one connected with the post office, before the letter can be transmitted.

If he wants to talk across the State line by word of mouth he must furnish an affidavit to the person that he is talking with. How could absurdity run wilder than that? Every provision in the bill is of a similar character. If this bill should ever become a law, regardless of the merits of the proposition, under the form of the bill what it will accomplish will be to prevent legitimate business, while it will still permit to a large extent the real gambling.

I have had this bill analyzed by one of the ablest men in the country connected with exchanges.

Mr. FOWLER. What is his name?

Mr. MANN. And I say upon my own responsibility, after a careful consideration of the bill, that the bill as drawn, in my judgment, will inure rather to the detriment of legitimate business than to the destruction of the gambling business which the gentlemen desire to see.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana withdraws his pro forma amendment, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person to send or cause to be sent any message offering to make or enter into a contract for the purchase or sale for future delivery of cotton without intending that such cotton shall be actually delivered or received, or offering to make or enter into a contract whereby any party thereto, or any party for whom or in whose behalf such contract is made, acquires the right or privilege to demand in the future the acceptance or delivery of cotton without being thereby obligated to accept or to deliver such cotton; and the transmission of any message relating to any such transaction is hereby declared to be an interference with commerce among the States and Territories and with foreign nations. Any person who shall be guilty of violating this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in any sum not more than $1,000 nor less than $100, or shall be imprisoned for not more than six months nor less than one month, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and the sending or causing to be sent of each such message shall constitute a separate offense.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all of section 2 and inserting in lieu thereof the following—

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri is offering a substitute for this section, and I desire to offer an amendment to the text.

The SPEAKER. Let the substitute be reported, so that we may know what it is.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the amendment as follows:

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person to send or cause to be sent any message offering to make or enter into a contract for the purchase or sale for future delivery of cotton, grain, or other farm product without intending that such cotton, grain, or other farm product shall be actually delivered or received, or offering to make or enter into a contract whereby any party thereto or any party for whom or in whose behalf such contract is made or acquires the right or privilege to demand in the future the acceptance or delivery of cotton, grain, or other farm product without specifying the grade to be delivered, and being thereby obligated to accept or to deliver such cotton, grain, or other farm product of the grades and quantities specified in said contract, and a settlement of a contract by the payment of a margin shall constitute prima facie evidence of a violation of this section; and the transmission of any message relating to any such transaction is hereby declared to be an unlawful interference with commerce among the States, Territories, insular possessions, District of Columbia, and with foreign nations. Any person who shall be guilty of violating this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in any sum not more than $1,000 nor less than $100, or shall be imprisoned for not more than six months nor less than one month, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and the sending or causing to be sent of such message shall constitute a separate offense.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois wish to argue his point of order before the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] offers his amendment?

Mr. MANN. I am willing to argue it any time so that I do not lose my right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will not lose his right. The Chair would rather have the whole thing before him at once.

Mr. MANN. If the point of order is made against the substitute it is not possible to offer any other amendment until the point of order is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. MANN. My point of order is that the amendment is not germane to section 2 of the bill and is not germane to the bill itself. The present rule is that an amendment must be germane to the bill.

The SPEAKER. From what is the gentleman reading?

Mr. MANN. I am going to read first from Jefferson's Manual, page 240 of the House Manual. Jefferson's Manual says:

> Amendments may be made so as totally to alter the nature of the proposition; and it is a way of getting rid of a proposition by making it bear a sense different from what it was intended by the movers, so that they vote against it themselves.

That was the old rule. Paragraph 7 of Rule XVI, page 384 of the manual, says:

> And no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

The provision of the bill is, first, the title relates to commerce. The bill all through relates to the transmission of messages relating to cotton. Section 2 of the bill specifically provides that it shall be unlawful for any person to send or cause to be sent any message offering to make or enter into a contract for the purchase or sale of future delivery of cotton without intent that such cotton shall be actually delivered or received.

The amendment by way of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] proposes to make the section read "cotton, grain, or other agricultural products," and the question is, Where the bill describes a particular thing, whether it is germane to add to that a general class of objects? There are many precedents on the subject. Page 385 of the Manual says:

> In determining whether or not an amendment be germane, certain principles are established.
> (a) One individual proposition may not be amended by another individual proposition even though the two belong to the same class. Thus, the following are not germane: To a bill proposing the admission of one Territory into the Union, an amendment for admission of another Territory (V, 5529); to a bill for the relief of one individual an amendment proposing similar relief for another (V, 5826–5829); to a resolution providing a special order for one bill, an amendment to include another bill (V, 5834–5836); to a provision for extermination of the cotton-boll weevil, an amendment including the gypsy moth (V, 5832); to a provision for a clerk for one committee, an amendment for a clerk to another committee (V, 5833).
> (b) A specific subject may not be amended by a provision general in nature, even when of the class of the specific subject (V, 5843–5846). Thus, the following are not germane: To a bill for the admission of one Territory into the Union, an amendment providing for the admission of several other Territories (V, 5837); to a bill relating to all corporations engaged in interstate commerce, an amendment relating to all corporations (V, 5842); to a bill modifying an existing law as to one specific particular, an amendment relating to the terms of the law rather than those of the bill (V, 5806–5808).
> (c) A general subject may be amended by specific propositions of the same class. Thus, the following have been held to be germane: To a bill admitting several Territories into the Union, an amendment adding another Territory (V, 5838); to a bill providing for the construction of buildings in each of two cities, an amendment providing for similar buildings in several other cities (V, 5840); to a resolution embodying two distinct phases of international relationship, an amendment embodying a third (V, 5839). But to a resolution authorizing a class of employees in the service of the House, an amendment providing for the employment of a specified individual was held not to be germane (V, 5848–5849).
> (d) Two subjects are not necessarily germane because they are related. Thus, the following have been held not to be germane: To a proposition relating to the terms of Senators, an amendment changing the manner of their election (V, 5882); to a bill relating to commerce between the States, an amendment relating to commerce within the several States (V, 5841); to a proposition to relieve destitute citizens of the United States in Cuba, a proposition declaring a state of war in Cuba and proclaiming neutrality (V, 5897); to a proposition for the appointment of a select committee to investigate a certain subject, an amendment proposing an inquiry of the Executive on that subject (V, 5891); to a bill granting a right of way to a railroad, an amendment providing for the purchase of the railroad by the Government (V, 5887); to a provision for the erection of a building for a mint, an amendment to change the coinage laws (V, 5884).

There are various propositions stated in the Manual. If this were a bill in reference to cotton, wheat, corn, and oats, it would be admissible as germane to offer an amendment including some other object; because where you provide for a general class or a variety of classes you may add one more, but this bill is directed singly and solely to the subject of cotton, and being directed singly and solely to that one subject, an amendment proposing one other subject is not germane under the rules, and an amendment proposing a class of other subjects is not germane under the rules, as I have cited the precedents.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri proposes to add one other class and then proposes to add a general variety of classes, making it inimical to the rulings in both particulars.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. On which side of the question is the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am on the other side. I wish to speak in behalf of this amendment being in order under the rule.

Mr. MANN. I will reserve my point of order if anybody desires me to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to discuss the point of order.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can do both, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I contend that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri is in order under the rule.

The gentleman from Illinois has referred to a number of decisions which I do not question, but which do not apply to the particular case now before the House. Many of them refer to amendments which were offered to paragraphs in appropriation bills, when it was held that as to a particular paragraph in an appropriation bill specifically restricted to a certain matter, an amendment to broaden the scope of that paragraph was not in order.

This is a bill "to prohibit interference with commerce among the States and Territories and among foreign nations, and to remove obstructions thereto, and to prohibit the transmission of certain messages by telegraph, telephone, cable, or other means of communication between States, Territories, and foreign nations." That defines the purpose of this bill, to prohibit interference with commerce among the States by prohibiting the transmission of certain classes of messages; and the classes of messages to be prohibited are the messages that will, under the terms of the bill, interfere with commerce among the States.

In considering and determining whether an amendment be in order to a bill of this character, the primary purpose of the bill must be taken into account. What is the purpose of this bill? It is to prohibit interference with commerce among the States and Territories by prohibiting certain classes of messages. Authority exists for the proposition that I assert, that that being the primary purpose of this bill amendments to carry out that purpose are germane to the bill and in order. I have an authority that is as clear and as applicable to this bill as it is possible to be. I refer to section 5909, page 483, Volume V, Hinds' Precedents:

> 5909. To a bill providing for an interoceanic canal, specifying a certain route, an amendment providing for another route was held to be germane. On January 9, 1902, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was considering the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans when Mr. Richard W. Parker, of New Jersey, proposed an amendment providing for a canal across the Isthmus of Panama.
> Mr. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, made the point of order that the amendment was not germane, because, while the bill provided for a canal at Nicaragua only, the amendment provided also for a canal at another place. After debate, the Chairman said:
> "The subject matter of this bill—the enterprise upon which the House has entered—is, in the language of the bill—
> "'To construct a canal to connect the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.'
> "The Chair is of the opinion that that is the purpose of the legislation sought; that the question of location is wholly a subordinate one; and that it is perfectly competent for Congress to reject one location and to adopt another. For instance, suppose it was a question of the building of a house for the purpose of storing the records of the Government, and a bill was introduced to locate it on a certain square in this city. Can anybody doubt that the proposition might be amended so as to locate it upon another square?"

The subject matter of the pending bill is to prohibit interference with interstate commerce, and the House has the right to reject one class of messages prohibited and to prescribe another, or to add to or subtract from the class of messages recommended by the committee. In the language of the decision the purpose of the bill is to prohibit interference with commerce, and the character of the messages sent is wholly subordinate. It is more effectively to prevent the interference with interstate commerce than is set out in the bill that the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is offered.

I desire to call attention to another decision. I refer to section 5919, page 487, Volume V, Hinds' Precedents:

5919. An amendment on the subject of renovated butter was held to be germane to a bill relating to "oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products." On February 11, 1902, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union were considering the bill (H. R. 9206) to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of the State or Territory into which they are transported and to change the tax on oleomargarine, when Mr. Henry D. Allen, of Kentucky, proposed the following amendment:

"SEC. 4. That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and required to cause a rigid sanitary inspection to be made from time to time and at such times as he may deem necessary, of all factories and storehouses where butter is renovated; and all butter renovated at such places shall be carefully inspected in the same manner and to the same extent and purpose that meat products are now inspected. The quantity and quality of butter renovated shall be reported monthly. All renovated butter shall be designated as such by marks, brands, and labels, and the words "renovated butter" shall be printed on all packages thereof, in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and shall be sold only as renovated butter. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not less than $50 nor more than $500 and imprisoned not less than one month nor more than six months.

"The Secretary of Agriculture shall make all needful sanitary and other rules and regulations for carrying this section into effect, and no renovated butter shall be shipped or transported from one State to another or to foreign countries unless inspected as provided in this section."

Mr. James A. Tawney, of Minnesota, made a point of order that the amendment was not germane.

After debate, the Chairman said:

"The Chair is of the opinion that it is germane, although it is questionable as to whether the jurisdiction is obtained over the proposition without any taxation being connected with it. But the question being one of imitation butter, the Chair is of opinion that this section is germane."

The SPEAKER. The Chair would ask the gentleman from New York a question respecting the decision rendered by Judge Lacey, of Iowa, to which the gentleman from New York has just referred. Was not the reason he came to make that ruling that the bill purported to treat of oleomargarine and other imitations of butter products, and under that phraseology "other imitations of butter products" did he not render that decision respecting renovated butter?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I am not sufficient of a farmer to know exactly, but I believe I understand that renovated butter is not exactly an imitation but a product.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman limits his farming operations to cotton.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would ask the gentleman from New York whether or not Mr. Chairman Lacey did not make renovated butter germane because the language of the bill itself says "oleomargarine and other imitations."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think he was following the authority to which I have called attention, where the bill proposed to construct a canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, which was before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from New York as to that. What was the subject matter of that decision which Gen. Grosvenor rendered? Was it in regard to building the canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific or the place where it was to be built?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, he held, as I have called the attention of the Chair to the fact, that the primary purpose was building a canal to connect the two oceans, and that the location was subordinate. The primary purpose of this bill is to prohibit the interference with interstate commerce and——

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman a question right there. Is not the title of this bill itself contradictory and misleading?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I am about to call the attention of the Chair to another important fact. The bill before the House is H. R. 56. Now, I call the attention of the Chair to the bill H. R. 18323, the title of which is "a bill to prohibit"—and if the Speaker will read the title of the bill he has in hand he will find that there is absolutely no difference—

A bill to prohibit interference with commerce among the States and Territories and with foreign nations and to remove obstructions thereto, and to prohibit the transmission of certain messages by telegraph, telephone, cable, or other means of communication between States and Territories and foreign nations.

The title is identical with the title of the bill which the Speaker has in his hand and which is pending in the House, and the purpose of that bill—18323—is to prohibit interference with commerce among the States and Territories, and the subordinate purpose, as set forth in the bill, is to prevent messages being sent which affect certain contracts for the purchase or sale for future delivery of wheat, corn, or oats. It is clear, the two bills coming from the one committee, that the primary purpose of both bills is to prohibit or prevent interference with commerce between the States, and that the commodities affected are subordinate to the primary purpose of the bill, or rather, the two bills considered by the same committee and reported from the same committee purporting to accomplish the same purpose.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Which bill is under consideration at this time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. House bill 56.

Mr. CANNON. Is that the one about cotton?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Then there is one on the calendar, or before the committee, about corn, wheat, and oats?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the purpose of the two bills is identical, and so identical that the committee could not find a single word of difference in which to express the purpose of the bill as set forth in the title. If corn, wheat, and oats are germane in one bill, when that is the title, how is it possible that they are not germane to another bill of the same title, the purpose being to prohibit or prevent interference with commerce between the States?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the statement of the committee itself——

Mr. FITZGERALD. That has nothing to do with it. The Chair has never been able to bolster up an unjustifiable decision by resorting to the plea of the special counsel reporting a bill. Even a court would not base its decision upon any such arguments.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOSTER. Does this debate come out of the time allotted under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. That was the question I was going to propound.

The SPEAKER. Suppose the question of order took up the whole hour?

Mr. MANN. The amendment in order would still be voted upon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. He thinks it has never been so held. This is a question of order which might in its possibilities take four hours.

A MEMBER. Or four days.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not speaking for my entertainment, but I have some views which I wished to submit to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the Chair indicates any desire that I should stop I will do so.

The SPEAKER. The title of this bill purports that it is to prohibit interference with commerce among the States, and so forth. Now, as a matter of fact, does not the text of the bill prohibit commerce? Is not the text of the bill right in the teeth of the title of the bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all. The theory of this bill is that certain so-called gambling transactions interfere and are destructive of commerce between the States, and those advocating this bill desire to remove what they believe to be obstructions to the proper transaction of business in certain commodities. That is the title; that is the purpose, and nobody will challenge it.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. If the purpose of the bill is as stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], how does the Committee on Agriculture get the jurisdiction of it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not material, for the reason that as it is a general bill, the committee having reported it the question of jurisdiction can not be raised. The gentleman knows as well as I do the jurisdiction of the committee under the rules.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield in that connection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The bill was referred to the Committee on Agriculture by the Speaker in both cases. If the Speaker had considered that the main subject was interstate commerce, would he not have referred the bill to the proper committee, considering it was relating to agricultural products——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the Speaker did what any other occupant of the chair would have done. For a number of years identical bills have been introduced in this House, and under the régime of the friends of the gentleman from Illinois, for one reason or another, I have never been able to determine just what, they were sent to the Committee on Agriculture, and under the well-established practice of the House that having been done, and not challenged and not objected to, and that committee having considered and reported the bills in the ordinary course of events, the following Speaker would naturally, there having been no change of the rules, send the bill to the same committee. I believe any other course would have subjected the Speaker to criticism

Mr. MANN. Nobody is criticizing the Speaker. He referred the bill correctly. The principal subject is not commerce. The principal subject is transactions as to agricultural products.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, that is the argument I made the other day, to the effect that these messages did not constitute interstate commerce, and I did not know at that time that the gentleman had assented to my position. Of course, if my contention be correct, as it now seems the gentleman from Illinois agrees, this bill is not constitutional.

Mr. MANN. We are both opposed to the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Speaker sent these bills to the Committee on Agriculture, I assume—I have not asked why or conferred with him—because for a number of years similar bills have been introduced in the House and have been sent to that committee, hearings have been held by that committee, and members of that committee were supposed to be more familiar with the subject than the members of the committee over which the gentleman formerly presided.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. LEVER. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the oleomargarine act, placing a tax on oleomargarine—a bill proposing to raise revenue—which, by right, ought to have gone to the Ways and Means Committee, went to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman holds that the object of the bill was to raise revenue?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have to recognize that certain bills have to go to certain committees because of reasons over which the Speaker has no control. Nobody pretends to question the propriety of the reference, and it does not help out the question as to whether this amendment is in order or not. The primary purpose of this bill being to prohibit acts which it is contended are in interference with commerce between the States, and the same committee having reported two bills with the identical title, one covering a matter that is now before the House and the other covering the commodities to be affected by the amendment now pending in the House, it seems to me there can be no question whatever. The amendment must be germane to this bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Just a word in that connection. I would like to call the Speaker's attention to the statement of the committee as to the purpose of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman refer to H. R. 56?

Mr. LONGWORTH. H. R. 56. The only statement in the report as to the purpose of the bill is this statement, which I will read to the Chair:

> The purpose of the bill is to restrict, so far as may be, those transactions on the cotton exchanges of the country which are recognized as dealing only with the fluctuations in the price of cotton and which do not involve the actual transfer of the commodity.

That is the statement of the committee itself with regard to the purpose of the bill.

Mr. MANN. One word, Mr. Speaker. We had a question very similar to this in the House only a few days ago, when the bill providing for the creation of the department of labor was under consideration in Committee of the Whole last Wednesday. I then offered an amendment to that bill, providing for the appointment of a commission to study subjects provided for in the bill itself in cooperation with the department of labor. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] made the point of order that the amendment which I offered was not germane to the bill. While I thought the Chair was erroneous, the Chair held that although the two matters related to the same subject, yet the amendment providing for the appointment of a commission was not germane to a bill providing for the creation of the department of labor, and ruled the amendment out of order.

I will not take the time of the Speaker to discuss the cases cited by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. They are all referred to in the manual in connection with the cases which he cited; and the cases which he cited, in my judgment, have no relation to the subject now under consideration.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, just one word. I have heard a great deal of lore upon precedents in this House concerning this matter. Now, this is a subject sui generis. The question here is not whether it is a product of the soil so much as it is a question of gambling in the future products of the soil. Therefore——

The SPEAKER. Is that the question or not?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I think that is absolutely the question. Both bills here aim at the same proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows that; but the House at the present time has nothing to do with that second bill that the gentleman from New York cited.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Well, I want to say in regard to that, Mr. Speaker, the illustration that has been given here concerning whether it was a bill in behalf of one man, and therefore an amendment would be in order in behalf of another, does not apply in this case at all, because this is a subject relating to the question of a production of the soil, and cotton is one and grain is another. There surely can be no question between us that there should be any disrelation between the two.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to add one observation, if I may. If the bill H. R. 18323 were pending, which covers wheat and oats and corn, and an amendment were offered to insert the word "cotton," no man in this House would seriously contend that that amendment was subject to a point of order because not germane.

The SPEAKER. No; he would not if he had ever read the decisions. He would not contend it for half a second. It would undoubtedly be competent to offer to that bill that the gentleman refers to an amendment to insert the word "cotton."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then, Mr. Speaker, it would be very extraordinary if one bill is germane to the subject matter of another and that one in turn not germane to the bill germane to it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule, and does not want to hear any more arguments about it. [Laughter.] The Chair did not mean to be discourteous at all. If the Chair chose to do so, he could find precedents in the action of eminent Speakers whereby he could submit this question to the House and dodge it. Mr. Speaker Blaine, one of the greatest men who ever occupied the Speaker's chair [applause], did that on more than one occasion [laughter], and the Chair has one of the precedents right here before him now. But the Chair is not going to do anything of the sort. The Chair had two or three hours' notice that this question would probably be raised, and the Chair went to work and examined all the precedents, and they all run one way. It does not make any difference what the Chair wants about this bill or what anybody else wants. The only thing for the Speaker to do is either to follow the precedents or to upset them and make a new one. With the merits of the bill he has absolutely nothing to do in ruling on the point of order.

The parliamentary situation is this: The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] offers a substitute for section 2 of the bill, by which substitute he proposes to add wheat, corn, and so forth, to the bill. The proposition, whether brought in as an amendment or in a motion to recommit, which is the same thing precisely, must be germane.

Now, it has been held, with reference to the last suggestion made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that if the other bill—that is, the one treating of futures in wheat, corn, and several other subjects—were pending here, which is general in its character, then we could add to it by way of amendment the item of cotton. There is no question whatever about that, if we pay any attention to the precedents. It has been held, for instance, that if a bill were pending to admit one Territory into the Union as a State we could not add another as an amendment; that situation would be identical with the present situation; but when the proposition was turned around, and there was a bill that proposed to bring more than one Territory into the Union as States, then we could add another Territory to that bunch. All of the decisions run in the same direction. Right or wrong, that is the substance of all the decisions, and there are many of them.

Now, let us apply these precedents to the case before us. What is the subject matter of the section to which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] is offering an amendment by way of substitute? And what is the subject matter of this bill? The Chair expresses his own opinion, independent of this report, that the only thing talked about or treated in this bill is the question of dealing in cotton futures. The committee must have known what it was up to, or thought it did, when it presented this report. Here is a paragraph from the report:

> The purpose of the bill is to restrict, so far as may be, those transactions on the cotton exchanges of the country which are recognized as dealing only with the fluctuations in the price of cotton and which do not involve the actual transfer of the commodity. It does not seek to prohibit or to interfere with a single legitimate transaction in cotton.

And so forth.

The precedent that comes nearest to supporting the contention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is one about renovated butter. The title of the bill under consideration then was in reference to "oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products." Evidently the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Lacey, who happened to be in the chair at that time, let this amendment about renovated butter come in under the words "imitation of dairy products," because I know enough about butter—and most of the Members of this House do, especially those from the rural districts—to know that renovated butter is essentially an imitation of butter.

The decision which Gen. Grosvenor rendered about the canals was a correct decision, and if I had been in the chair I would have decided the same way myself. The question then under consideration was building a canal to connect the waters of the Atlantic and the Pacific, and the fact that the original bill referred to the Nicaragua route and the amendments proposing the Panama route were mere incidents.

In one case Mr. Speaker CANNON rendered a decision which is in point here. There was a proposition pending in the House to appropriate money to get rid of the boll weevil, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] offered an amendment to appropriate money to get rid of the gypsy moth. Speaker CANNON ruled that one proposition had nothing to do with the other.

The matter in controversy here is cotton and cotton futures, and nothing else, and the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is sustained.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill by striking out the word "cotton" wherever it occurs in section 2 of the bill and substitute the words "agricultural products."

Mr. MANN. I make a point of order against the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the word "cotton" where it occurs in line 20, line 25, and line 1 on page 3.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the word "cotton" where it occurs on page 2, lines 20 and 25, and also on line 1, page 3.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, there was sufficient room for difference of opinion on the point of order raised to make me acquiesce in whatever decision the Chair made. The Speaker said that it would be easy to find authorities leading one way or the other. I do not find fault with the Chair for deciding the question in the manner in which he did in view of the authorities. But if this House desires to make this bill apply to wheat and corn and oats and other farm products, it can do so without violating the rules of the House and without asking the Speaker to make a ruling which would be in defiance of his honest judgment.

The adoption of the amendment which I offer will take from this section the word "cotton," and that being out of the section it would not be possible to hold that this section would apply only to cotton. It would then be in order to insert in proper places the words "cotton, wheat, corn, or oats."

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado rose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can not yield, for I have only five minutes. It is a perfectly proper and legitimate procedure. It will enable this House under its rules, which I have always contemplated were sufficiently liberal to enable the House to do what it wishes if it knows what it wishes and knows how to do it, to do what apparently is the desire of the great majority of the Members of the House. If this amendment be adopted, I shall offer an amendment to insert "wheat, corn, oats, cotton, and other farm products," and I shall test the sincerity of the Members of the House in this manner by giving them an opportunity to record themselves on this amendment as a preliminary step under the rules of the House so to broaden this bill that it will cover other commodities and similar transactions, which are just as offensive to morals and just as detrimental to business as the same transactions are claimed to be with reference to cotton.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary to strain the rules; it is not necessary to make ruilngs that can not be justified under the precedents to do what is desired. It is easy to accomplish legitimately what I asssume the House desires.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. If the Committee on Rules would bring in a rule making in order the consideration of the bill with reference to wheat, corn, oats, and so forth, would the gentleman from New York help us to put the bill through?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman mean if I would vote for the bill?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I could not vote for it honestly. I do not intend to deceive anybody about my position on these two bills. They cover the same transactions in different commodities. Why the committee segregated cotton from the other products I do not know. Why the committee did not include them all in one bill I do not know. The people in the section from which I come are affected as much by one as the other. They have exchanges of a similar character upon which all of these commodities are dealt in, and it seems to me that gentlemen should not attempt to single out one class as victims of this legislation and let the others go free. I wish to eliminate the abuse in these transactions wherever they may be, but I do not wish to destroy legitimate business. As I have heretofore given my reasons for believing the bills in contravention of the Constitution, I can not vote for either one.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I was about to say a moment ago that the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture disclosed the fact that neither the president of the New York Exchange nor the president of the New Orleans Exchange knew how many bales of cotton were actually handled on these exchanges in a single year. We asked these gentlemen, "Do you know how many bales of cotton are delivered on contracts made on your exchanges in one year?" and they answered that they did not. We asked them, "Do you know what percentage of the contracts made on your exchange in a year is fulfilled?" "I do not," came the answer from both exchanges. Then Mr. BEALL said, "Is there any way to get at that?" "I know of no way," said Mr. Nevill, of New York, "except showing our books, and I would not do that."

So, Mr. Speaker, the House has some idea now of what kind of a skin game the cotton producer is up against. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DICKSON] has shown you that the New York Exchange in one year, in 1895 or 1896, when they were required to keep a record, received 23,000 bales, sold 90,000,000 bales, and had 169,000 bales left out of a crop of 10,000,000 bales. [Laughter and applause.]

I can not account for that cotton miracle except upon the reverse of the process employed by the bees in packing honey in the bee gum of old man Thornton in my district. He said, "I had a five-gallon bee gum and we robbed it the other day and got seven gallons of honey and two and a half gallons of honeycomb." Flue Busbee said, "Uncle Jake, you just said that it was a five-gallon gum," and he replied, "By gosh, bees are the out-packinest things you ever seen in this world." [Laughter.]

So, Mr. Speaker, we have these slick-fingered artists of the exchange treating us to a genuine cotton miracle. Nobody but an exchange member could sell 90,000,000 bales of cotton out of a 10,000,000 crop. [Laughter and applause.] It takes the cotton producer of the South 12 months to make a cotton crop of 12,000,000 bales, but these gentlemen on the exchange can, in a few nights with a few chalk marks, make 500,000,000 bales. [Applause.] We have this mysterious and miraculous cotton in competition with actual cotton. One of the gentlemen in the hearings, Mr. Patteson, of Memphis, said that he dealt in manufactured feed stuff. When asked to whom he sold he said to everybody, from the man who wants 1 bushel to the man who wants 50 carloads. I then asked him who fixed the price of his produce, and he answered that he fixed the price himself. And yet gentlemen say, Who will fix the price for the cotton producer if the exchange does not? The cotton producer is denied now the right to say anything about what the price of his cotton shall be. If you take his cotton out of competition with this fictitious stuff, he will have a voice like the wool-grower has in fixing the price of wool, he will have a voice like the hay grower has in fixing the price of hay. As I have said here before, hay and wool have no exchange to fix the price of hay and wool. Why should the cotton producers of the South be compelled to submit to the evils of a gambling exchange? All that I ask at the hands of this House, and I ask it in the name of the cotton producers themselves, is an open market, where real cotton is bought and sold and real cotton is delivered on contracts. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] if on no other ground than on the old ground that we should beware of the Greeks bearing gifts. We know the purpose of the gentleman is ultimately to succeed in defeating this legislation by one means or another. I favor the bill, and my reasons for favoring it are broad and deep. All legitimate producers are always and equally entitled to the regard and esteem of the people; the care and consideration of Congress. The fruit grower, the cotton grower, the grain grower produce something and add to the wealth and welfare of the world. The manufacturer, no less than the grain grower or the cotton grower, is a producer, because he also adds to the value of the product and to the wealth and welfare of the world. Transportation agencies are no less producers than diggers of the soil, because they bring to the consumers the products of labor. The merchant is a producer also, because he aids in the distribution of products, a very essential element of their value. The physician is a producer, because he gives strength and health to the toiler. The teacher is a producer, because he trains the mind and body of his brother toiler. The writer is a producer, because he gives mental pabulum for the enjoyment and the mental and moral upbuilding of the human race. The player in the theater is a producer, because he adds to the sum total of the human possessions and enjoyments. So the lawyer, honestly aiding in administering the laws of the country and preserving and protecting the rights of property and of life, is a producer and helps secure the happiness of the whole human race. All these and many others forming the whole body of useful citizenship are entitled to equal consideration and esteem, but there are those who live who are in the class of leeches, who fasten themselves on the body politic and grow fat by sucking the life blood of their victim. They toil not, neither do they spin; yet Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these. They are those who reap where they have not sown, who gather where they have not strewn. If a man must gamble, adding thereby nothing to the sum total of human life or possessions, he had best betake himself to the game of poker. It is fair and even, if played between gentlemen. It is bad enough, but its evil is limited and confined to few. Next to that in objectionable features, perhaps, is horse racing, and that would not be so bad were it not for the throw-offs and the put-up jobs. The Louisiana lottery had its place in the history of our country. It was fair in one respect, in that there was only a certain percentage taken out to pay expenses and large profits. Every ticket holder was given a fair and equal chance to draw a lucky number in the distribution of the prizes left over after the company had taken out its unearned but great percentage of the moneys paid in. We have by law stopped almost all forms of professed gambling—big and small. We have forbidden them at least to be flaunted in the public face.

But this cotton-future gambling is a shell game, pure and simple; it is a bald, barefaced skinning of the whole people.

There is neither justification nor excuse nor mitigation for it, and its place in the economy of this country is that of the gambler who does not give his victim a chance for his life. But being a business in which the constituents of some Members, and worthy Members of this body, are engaged, it finds defenders in this body as any other business would if the welfare of a number of our constituents were involved in it. But if there were no constituents of any Member of this House whose business was substantially the making of a livelihood and growing rich out of this calling, there would be no opposition to this bill to-day. Take away the great cities where stock gambling is rampant—New York, New Orleans, Chicago, St. Louis, and places where men live and thrive upon the losses and desolation wrought by the gambler in the futures of cotton, grain, and other products—I say take away the influences that arise from the industry and there would be absolutely no opposition to this measure. This industry never planted a seed, never spun a thread, never laid a brick, never added a grain to the health, wealth, or welfare of mankind. It is a leech, a vampire, and ought to be killed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend it by making it on this section.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves as an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri that all debate on this section close in five minutes.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. That will be done in a moment. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by making debate close in 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to inquire whether debate is not already closed on this amendment?

The SPEAKER. Under the rule it is closed if anybody objects to an extension of time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time is left?

The SPEAKER. There are 29 minutes left.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri by moving that all debate close in 29 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It will take a quorum to do that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri that all debate on this section close in 29 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I think that the gentleman from Missouri made a motion to close debate upon this amendment, and my motion was that all debate on this section close in five minutes, and the amendment which the gentleman from Illinois offers now is not in order to that amendment.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] offered a motion that all debate upon the pending amendment close in five minutes; thereupon my colleague moved to amend by making all debate upon the section close in five minutes. That was adopted, but the motion has not been put yet upon the motion of the gentleman from Missouri as amended, and that is still subject to amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I offer to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois by striking out "29" and inserting "immediately."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against that that it is an amendment in the third degree.

The SPEAKER. The situation about it is that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] moved that all debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York close in five minutes. Then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] offered to amend that by moving that all debate on the section close in five minutes, and that was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. That amendment was.

The SPEAKER. That leaves the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri as amended by the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was a motion, not an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is right about that—that was a motion. The gentleman from New York is technically correct. That left the motion of the gentleman from Missouri as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] undecided.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, the gentleman offered an amendment to that motion, and I offer an amendment to his amendment, which is in the second degree.

Mr. MANN. Certainly not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The pending motion is the motion as amended.

The SPEAKER. The pending motion is the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] as amended by the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers an amendment to that to close debate in 29 minutes. That is pending. Then the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves to strike out "twenty-nine" and insert "immediately," and the vote is on that proposition.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 57.

The SPEAKER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is rejected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no. I move to amend by striking out "twenty-nine" and inserting "ten" minutes. I call the attention of the House to the fact——

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that the motion is not debatable. The gentleman ought not to violate the rules.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will not. I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOWLER. My point of order is that there has been more than two speeches on this motion.

The SPEAKER. Why, there is nobody trying to make a speech on this motion, unless the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] gets unanimous consent.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, the motion that is before the House now deals with the question of debate upon the amendment, and there has been more than two speeches made upon that amendment.

The SPEAKER. That is true.

Mr. FOWLER. And I make the point of order that the time has expired for debate on that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The time would have expired, and the Chair would have so ruled if the point had been made and the gentleman from Missouri had not offered his motion.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is the time now being consumed being taken out of the hour?

The SPEAKER. It is not. That ruling may be wrong, but the Chair is going to stick to it to-day anyway. [Applause.]

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to insert "10 minutes" instead of "29 minutes" for the closing of the debate on this section.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman gets that consent will that time be taken out?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will give consent for the same amount of time to the gentleman in charge of the bill——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] have five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL], in charge of the bill, have each five minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. I object.

Mr. FINLEY. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado objects. The question is on the 10-minute proposition.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FOSTER. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 44, noes 64.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend by making it 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that that motion is a dilatory motion.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] moves to close debate on this question in 15 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute on the motion.

Mr. MANN. He can get it after we close debate.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MADDEN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] objects. The question is on agreeing to the motion to close the debate in 15 minutes.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division. We are going to have a quorum here.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 71.

So the motion was lost.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY], as amended by the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], to close debate on this section in five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the motion that is pending is an amendment offered by me to close debate in 29 minutes.

The SPEAKER. That is true. The vote will be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], to close debate on this section in 29 minutes.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OLMSTED. How long will that 29 minutes take beyond all the time allowed for debate on this bill in the House?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will it not consume all of the time?

The SPEAKER. It will consume all of the time.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] is recognized.

Mr. CLAYTON. It is necessary, Mr. Speaker, to make this statement.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] ought to have opportunity to make a report, although we are acting under a rule.

Mr. CLAYTON. I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, that before many minutes shall elapse the Senate will require the presence of the managers on the part of the House before that body, and therefore I desire to make a brief report to the House at this juncture.

Mr. Speaker, as one of the managers, and in behalf of all the managers on the part of the House of the impeachment proceedings, I beg to report to the House that the articles of impeachment prepared by the House of Representatives and preferred against Robert W. Archbald, a United States circuit judge and designated as a judge of the Commerce Court of the United States, have been exhibited and read to the Senate; that the Presiding Officer of that body stated to the managers that the Senate would take order in the premises, and that due notice of the same would be given to the House of Representatives.

SALE OF FUTURES IN COTTON.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to close debate on this section in 29 minutes.

The question was taken, and the amendment offered by Mr. MANN was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the pending amendment. All debate on the pending amendment is exhausted under the rule, and the first question to be determined is that amendment, before other amendments can be offered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the pending proposition is the motion offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] as amended by the amendment which was just adopted.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move, Mr. Speaker, to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not understand what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says.

Mr. MANN. The motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] to close debate on the section, as amended a moment ago, has not been put to the House. The Speaker put only the amendment which I offered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair's recollection is different. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. FOSTER, as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MANN.

The question was taken, and the motion of Mr. RUBEY as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is recognized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the pending amendment. All debate is exhausted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is correct.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that the House has control over the time. The House by a vote has decided that the debate on this section shall end in 29 minutes.

The SPEAKER. That is true, but that has nothing in the world to do with the voting on these amendments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. Otherwise no other amendment could be offered.

The SPEAKER. The vote is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, there is a message from the Senate that the House ought to receive at this time.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will suspend to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following order:

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, take a recess until 3 o'clock post meridian.

SALE OF FUTURES IN COTTON.

The House resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 56) to prohibit interference with commerce among the States and Territories and with foreign nations, and to remove obstructions thereto, and to prohibit the transmission of certain messages by telegraph, telephone, cable, or other means of communication between States and Territories and foreign nations.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 20, strike out the word "cotton" where it twice occurs in that line. Strike out the word "cotton," in line 25, page 2. Strike out the word "cotton," in line 1, page 3.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the amendment is three amendments and debate can be had upon all three.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is too late to make that point. I offered this as one amendment. The gentleman can have a division on the vote, but not for debate.

The SPEAKER. It is too late to raise that point now. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a division of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to divide the amendment. The Clerk will report the first substantive proposition.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 20, strike out the word "cotton" where it twice occurs in that line.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a division of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what the Chair has ordered.

Mr. MANN. I know; but it is not what the Clerk has reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment to strike out the word "cotton" where it first occurs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 20, strike out the word "cotton" at the beginning of the line.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 8, noes 87.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors and the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees. Those in favor of striking out the word "cotton" at the beginning of the line read by the Clerk will vote "aye," those opposed will vote "no," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 18, nays 209, answered "present" 11, not voting 151, as follows:

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. SCULLY, vote?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. BROWNING. I have a pair with the gentleman, and I wish to withdraw my vote of "no" and answer "present."

The name of Mr. BROWNING was called, and he answered "Present," as above recorded.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to withdraw my vote of "no" and be recorded as "present."

The Clerk called the name of Mr. MANN, and he answered "Present," as above recorded.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 20, strike out the word "cotton" where it occurs the second time in the line.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 25, strike out the word "cotton."

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 1, strike out the word "cotton."

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. How much time remains now under the rules?

The SPEAKER. Twenty-nine minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I have made a memorandum of analysis of H. R. 18323, which is identical with the bill under consideration, except that the present bill relates to cotton and the other bill relates to grain. I wish to call the attention of the House for a moment to some of the provisions in the bill H. R. 18323.

First. Section 2 of the bill creates two broad offenses; first, sending any message offering to make or enter into a contract for the purchase or sale for future delivery of wheat, corn, and oats without intending that such wheat, corn, or oats shall be actually delivered or received; second, offering to make or enter into a contract whereby any party acquires the right or privilege to demand in future acceptance or delivery of wheat, corn, or oats without being thereby obligated to accept or deliver such wheat, corn, or oats. The latter describes accurately the "put and call" trading. It is at the present time practiced on few of the leading grain exchanges, and nowhere is it a prominent feature of the business. The Chicago Board of Trade has absolutely forbidden it on this exchange, and other exchanges have done likewise. We have, however, on this exchange a system of trading in indemnities, which system is lawful under the statutes of this State and is necessary to the safe handling of grain products. This form of trading, however, would be absolutely condemned by this bill. Let me illustrate this: Suppose A, in Chicago, at the close to-day has offered 1,000,000 bushels of wheat to B, at Liverpool, at $1 per bushel; he will not get an acceptance of his offer by cable until the following morning. If B, however, does accept A's offer the contract is made whereby A is obligated to sell and deliver 1,000,000 bushels of wheat to B at $1 per bushel. To safeguard himself against the contingency that B may accept his offer by the following morning and that the price of wheat has risen to $1.02, or higher, per bushel, A will purchase from some trader an option for 1,000,000 bushels of wheat. If B rejects A's offer, A loses his insurance premium. If he accepts it and the price in the meantime has risen higher than the indemnity price, A calls upon the seller of the indemnity to deliver him the wheat.

Under the second clause of section 2 this form of trading, which is so absolutely essential to the merchandising of grain, will be absolutely forbidden, and the person who practices it is liable to imprisonment for doing a thing prompted by common business prudence.

Second. The first offense described in section 2 has to do with the ordinary and regular system of future trading as practiced upon the leading exchanges. As the section reads now it would have no effect whatever, because every trade made upon any legitimate exchange contemplates the actual delivery of the commodity. This section accurately describes a transaction in a bucket shop, where delivery is never contemplated or possible, but not to future trading upon the exchanges. What the framer of this bill is driving at is to compel every man who buys or sells grain for future delivery to keep his contract open until the time for delivery comes, and to prevent the system of "set-off" which, in the case of the Chicago Board of Trade v. Christie (198 U. S., 236; 49 Law ed., 1031), was held to constitute a delivery as then carried on under the rules existing on the Chicago Board of Trade. The inquiry becomes pertinent here whether any statute should compel a man to hold a contract open beyond a time when he finds that his judgment was wrong, and that the maintenance of the contract will involve him in further loss.

Another of the many objections which can be urged against this provision of section 2 arises under the following state of facts, which happens not once but thousands and thousands of times during the course of a year: Suppose A, a grain dealer in Decatur, Ill., is purchasing grain freely from the farmers; the only way he can safely buy all the grain that is offered to him is by hedging each purchase on the Chicago Board of Trade as fast as he takes the grain into the elevator; in other words, every 5,000 bushels he buys from the farmer he immediately sells 5,000 bushels for future delivery on the Chicago Board of Trade. Within a month or so, however, he finds that because of some local condition he can get a better price for that cash grain in New Orleans than he can in Chicago, and being an enterprising and prudent business man, he ships the grain to New Orleans and sells it there. When he sells it in New Orleans he will buy back his hedge on the Chicago Board of Trade.

Now, section 2 of this bill, in connection with the last few lines of section 3 which provide that the failure to deliver or receive the grain shall be prima facie evidence that there was no intention to deliver or receive such grain when the contract was made, would render the grain dealer at Decatur liable to a penitentiary sentence for adopting this course. I mean by this that the mere fact that he did not actually deliver the grain in Chicago, would be prima facie evidence whereby the case would go to the jury for their determination as to his original intent. In your judgment is it right and just that a business man should be exposed to the verdict of a jury composed largely of men who are absolutely ignorant of the grain business because he had adopted this prudent method of conducting his business?

Let me give another illustration of the absurdity of the proposed bill. Here is a miller who has purchased 100,000 bushels of wheat at $1 per bushel to grind into flour. The illustration is equally pertinent to the case of a feeder of live stock who has purchased several hundred thousand bushels of corn to fatten cattle. The miller concludes that the price of wheat is going to decline which will cause the price of flour which is made from the wheat to decline; moreover, the cattle dealer sees a declining market for cattle; neither desires to speculate and therefore they hedge the amount of wheat or corn they have on hand upon some produce exchange. Now, it is perfectly evident that the miller can not deliver wheat on that contract, nor can the live-stock feeder deliver corn; what they do is to ship the finished product to market and when they have merchandised such finished product they buy in their hedge. Under the operation of this proposed bill, both the miller and the live-stock feeder would be in the shadow of the penitentiary.

There are illustrations almost without number whereby this bill can be shown to interfere with the most legitimate forms of commerce without reaching those particular forms of speculative trading which in the minds of its framer were considered undesirable. It does not touch the man who stands in the pit and buys and sells for his own account, because over those transactions the Federal Government would have no control. It is not admitted for a moment that the position of this man is in any degree less legitimate or less necessary than the man outside of the exchange, but it is a fact that a large part of the transactions on the exchanges for the account of persons away from the exchange and who used the telegraph, telephone, and mails to execute their trade are the most legitimate hedging transactions, which Members of Congress generally admit to be perfectly legitimate; and yet this bill seeks, if not to prevent such transactions, at least to fetter them so that they could not be commercially carried on.

There are so many features of this proposed bill which, in matter of form, are easily seen to be not simply unwise, but absolutely futile to effect the objects sought by the proposer, that anyone familiar with the business could take up hours in pointing out its defects. I have said enough, I trust, to indicate a few of the features which are objectionable. Under the bill as now drafted a legitimate exchange could live, although the difficulties would be almost insuperable; but is it necessary, in order to eradicate some few minor defects in the system of future trading, to destroy the whole institution?

ANTICOTTON-FUTURES BILL.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, this measure, designed to prohibit interstate communications relative to cotton futures, should be amended so as to include other agricultural products. I am in favor of the bill, but would like to see its terms applicable to all agricultural products. A part compliance with the promises of a platform pledge differs from a total breach of it only in degree. The Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore touching upon this subject is as follows:

> We believe in encouraging the development of a modern system of agriculture by a systematic effort to improve the conditions of trade in farm products so as to benefit both the consumers and producers, and as an efficient means to this end we favor the enactment by Congress of legislation that will suppress the pernicious practice of gambling in agricultural products by organized exchanges or others.

It is clear that the platform is directed against dealings in futures in all agricultural products, and that to limit the reform to one product is but a partial compliance. I understand that the reason given by those in charge of the legislation for not embracing all agricultural products in the bill is that such a course might combine opposition to the measure from all the stock exchanges and occasion the defeat of this bill. The argument is not sound. The application of the principle to one agricultural product alone, in my judgment, can not be justified. Those who favor the legislation touching grain and other agricultural products might be induced to oppose the bill for the very reason that it does not embrace the products in which they are most directly concerned. To embrace all agricultural products in one bill would concentrate the support of all the friends of such legislation and force a direct issue that can not be avoided.

During the last Congress we passed almost unanimously through this House a bill very similar to the one under consideration. The fact that its provisions were limited to cotton and that it did not apply to other agricultural products was used at the other end of the Capitol to prevent its consideration and passage there.

The pledge in the Democratic platform will be only partially fulfilled by the passage of this bill. Unless I am assured that it is the purpose of those in charge of the legislation to secure the speedy consideration of the Rubey bill or some other measure including other agricultural products, I shall, if the opportunity can be secured, vote to amend this bill so as to make it respond to the Baltimore platform. In all probability the parliamentary situation will prevent this. I hope the House will insist on considering the bill by Mr. RUBEY, of Missouri, relating to futures in grain.

Mr. Speaker, while I should like very much to see this legislation comply fully with the terms of the Democratic platform and relate to all agricultural products, still I realize the parliamentary situation, and I am in favor of the bill in the form in which we are now considering it, unless an opportunity is afforded of amending the bill, as I have heretofore stated. I desire to call the attention of the member of the committee in charge of the bill to one feature of it which is not satisfactory, and that is that the affidavit which a person desiring to send messages relating to the purchase and sale of cotton intended for future delivery is permitted to file under the provisions of the bill relates solely to messages being sent or to be sent. I desire to suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill and to others interested whether it be not necessary and advisable to adopt an amendment which will require the statement in the affidavit that the messages that have heretofore been sent—that is, the messages sent before the affidavit was made—have not violated the provisions of this legislation and did not come within the prohibited messages. In other words, on page 4 of the bill, in line 6, after the word "stating," insert the following words:

> That no message relating to any such contract, or offers to contract, as are described in section 2 of this act, has been sent, or caused to be sent, by this affiant, and.

Unless some such amendment be adopted the making of the affidavit may afford a certain means of evasion. To illustrate: A speculator has the bona fide intention at the time he makes the affidavit of complying with its provisions. He does not intend, when he makes the affidavit, to send any message during the next six months relating to a contract for futures. After he makes the affidavit he changes his intention and does in fact send such a message. He is indicted. Would that constitute a false statement in the affidavit? Probably not, because the affidavit could only express the intention of the affiant at the time he was sworn, and his obligation might be regarded as a mere promise and not as a statement of fact. In order to prevent the sending of prohibited messages after the making of the affidavit, subsequent affidavits should embrace the declaration that no prohibited messages have been sent.

This suggestion is submitted in a sincere desire to improve the bill and to make its provisions effective. It is, of course, desirable to relieve persons engaged in legitimate transactions from the obligation of making an affidavit every time they send an interstate message relating to the purchase or sale of the commodities which come within the provisions of the legislation. The affidavit that no such messages will be sent is inadequate. It should also contain the statement of fact that no such messages have been sent. In order to make the affidavit enforceable it should relate to past or present acts and not to future acts alone, which, to say the least, will be difficult of enforcement.

Commencing on line 14 is found the provision:

> Any person who knowingly shall make false statements in any affidavit provided for in this act shall be punishable—

And so forth.

Would it constitute a false statement if the person desiring to send messages relating to the purchase or sale of commodities in good faith, intending at the time of the making of the affidavit not to violate his promise, should subsequently alter his plans and send messages that are prohibited? This question can be obviated by inserting, after the word "stating," in line 6, page 4, the following words:

> That no message relating to any such contract or offers to contract, as are described in section 2 of this act, has been sent or caused to be sent by this affiant, and.

It is questionable whether or not you can make this promise—and an affidavit that one will not do a thing is nothing more than a promise—whether you can make this promise that one will not send such messages, enforceable under this bill. If we want to relieve those who are engaged in legitimate transactions of inconvenience, it will be necessary to adopt this amendment or some similar amendment; otherwise I do not think the affidavit will accomplish any valuable purpose. I suggest that to the consideration of the gentlemen who are in charge of the bill, and if it be deemed desirable I will offer that amendment in the event opportunity is afforded, which, under the parliamentary status, I can see is quite doubtful.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question concerning affidavits?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think it is within the power of Congress to require an agent of the telegraph company to take an affidavit without charge?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think it is exceedingly doubtful whether Congress or any other legislative body can require any person or agent to perform any service for nothing.

Mr. MANN. And yet it is required under this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. I observe that.

Mr. MANN. It says he is required to do it; that is all it says. He administers the oath.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am heartily in sympathy with the purpose of this legislation. I believe it is directed against a great evil, but I do think if the affidavit is to be of any value it should be amended so that if the affiant makes a false statement he can be punished for that false statement. If he says he will not send and has no intention at the time he makes that statement of sending prohibited messages you certainly can not punish him for changing his intention after that. That is as clear a statement of the proposition as I can make.

Federal legislation directed against dealings in futures in agricultural products has been a subject of discussion for almost a quarter of a century. In the past it has been proposed to invoke the taxing power of the Government to prevent it. In the legislation now under consideration the alleged evil is sought to be abolished through the exercise of the power of Congress to regulate interstate and foreign commerce. I am not unmindful of the objections which have been urged against legislation of this character. The principal objections urged are that the bill is unconstitutional, that it is not enforceable, and that it will needlessly interfere with legitimate business.

THE LEGISLATION IS CONSTITUTIONAL.

The objection that the bill is unconstitutional does not seem to me to be sustained. The power must exist either in the States, in the exercise of their police powers, or in the Government, in the exercise of its power to control interstate and foreign commerce, to regulate these transactions. If it be conceded, as suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], that under the decision of the Supreme Court in Chicago Board of Trade v. Christy (198 U. S., 236), Ware & Leland v. Mobile County (209 U. S., 405), Clews v. Jamieson (182 U. S., 461), Leloup v. Port of Mobile (127 U. S., 640), it is competent for the State, in the exercise of its police powers, to forbid contracts for the sale of futures, and that such statutes are not in derogation of the power of Congress over interstate and foreign commerce, it still does not preclude, in my judgment, the conclusion that Cohgress has the power, under the commerce clause, to deal with agencies of interstate communication—the mails, telegraph and telephone lines—and to prevent the transmission of messages relating to such forbidden contracts. I have some doubt as to the constitutionality of the bill, but I shall cheerfully support it and leave the courts to determine that issue.

It is true that no accurate and complete definition of interstate commerce has been made by the courts. They have dealt with the question from the standpoint of the issues involved in the many cases which have been considered. The trend of all the authorities is that the Federal power over interstate commerce is plenary, and that it extends to the means and agencies of interstate commerce. The Lottery case and subsequent decisions upholding it, while not conclusive of the constitutionality of the bill, are strongly in favor of it.

The sole question involved in the case cited by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], Ware & Leland v. Mobile County (209 U. S., 405), was whether the statute of Alabama levying a license on persons buying and selling futures for speculation or on commission was an attempt to regulate interstate commerce. The court indicated that while brokers were not common carriers, telegraph companies are. The most that can be said concerning this case is that it holds that the contracts themselves are not interstate commerce. We need not declare that the messages forbidden are commerce. We have plenary power over interstate telegraph and telephone lines as instrumentalities of commerce and can forbid them from transmitting messages of an objectionable character. The Supreme Court has held that the telegraph is an instrument of commerce and that telegraph companies are subject to the regulation of Congress. Why should not the same rule apply to interstate telephone lines?

THE MERITS OF THE MEASURE.

The plank in the Baltimore platform declaring for the suppression of the pernicious practice of gambling in agricultural products by organized exchanges or others is to be heartily approved. While the complete compliance with that platform demands that all agricultural products be embraced, still I shall support this bill even though it relates only to cotton. Let me assign briefly some reasons which impel me to support this legislation.

First, the transactions sought to be suppressed have no relation to legitimate business. There is no effort to interfere with the purchase or sale of any commodity for any purpose. The bill does not prevent speculation in actual cotton. If it becomes a law, cotton can still be bought and sold for every purpose for which it may now be bought and sold. The only requirement is that the transactions shall be bona fide sales and purchases and relate only to the actual commodity.

Second. It is immaterial whether the net result of future transactions has been to increase or depress the price of cotton. The governing consideration is that dealings in futures have no legitimate place in modern trade and exert a baneful influence on commerce. Careful students of the subject generally seem to agree to the conclusion that transactions in futures bear a relationship to the price of the actual commodity. The sale of enormous quantities of fictitious cotton may "break the market" and cause a decline in prices, while the purchase at another time of large quantities of futures may cause a rise in price. The fluctuations thus produced are not occasioned by natural causes. Consequently power is acquired by those who dominate the "market" to amass enormous fortunes by simply buying or selling what they do not own and what, in fact, does not exist.

Third. The argument that the exchanges will suffer or be compelled to radically reform their methods does not convince me that the legislation is bad. I can not believe that to suppress the transactions aimed at in this bill will do more to the exchanges than to restore them to sound and legitimate business control; but if it be true that the measure will prove far-reaching in this regard, I will still support it, and that without hesitation. If exchanges are to be nurseries for gamblers, they must go. Dealings in futures have all the elements of a game of chance, and have come to be designated as gambling by many who pursue them.

Fourth. They are also a means of oppressing the poor. This results both directly and indirectly. Directly when the man of meager means, in the hope of getting rich quick, dissipates his possessions and his earnings in the great vortex of speculation. Indirectly when he who toils in the field observes the product of his labor manipulated by those who sit in rug-spread offices and gamble in the products of his toil.

The demand for this legislation comes primarily from the workers—the farmers and the spinners. Opposition comes only from the exchanges. My voice and my vote are with the workers.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, this bill has some very extraordinary provisions, one of which is that a man who seeks to enter into business transactions for the purchase of cotton is required to say in advance that the transaction is a legitimate and legal one. I do not believe that the Congress of the United States ought to be engaged in any attempt to force anybody to swear in advance that he is going to enter upon a legal transaction. The transaction itself ought to speak for its legality. How can anyone tell whether a transaction is to be legal or not in advance? It seems to me that a man ought to have the right to send a telegram to some other man in the United States and try to buy or offer to sell any kind of commodity, and that he ought not to be required to state when he sends that telegram that he intends to carry out the purpose for which the telegram is sent. Why, we would not be able to transact any kind of business if this policy were pursued in all the business relations in the country. It might just as well be said that a man could not offer to buy a house and lot, and that he could not send a telegram in reference to the purchase of a house and lot unless he stated in advance that what he proposed to do was legitimate and legal. To prosecute a man for failing to make an affidavit that he proposed to enter upon a legitimate business transaction it seems to me to be not a function of the Government of the United States, and I am inclined to believe that Congress could be engaged in a better business than trying to regulate the conduct of the legitimate affairs of the country in any such way as this bill proposes. If a man has sold a million bushels of grain, as my colleague said, to Liverpool, he would not under this bill be allowed to hedge against the rise of the price of that grain between the day it was shipped and the day it was received in Liverpool, and the price might be decidedly different on the day the ship arrived at Liverpool from the price of the grain on the day it began its journey. If this bill is passed we are regulating the exchanges of the United States, preventing those exchanges from making quotations and transacting business, and we are leaving the whole regulation of the commodity and its price to the exchanges of the world outside of America where we have no jurisdiction over them.

I think the people who are interested in raising and selling cotton, if this bill should become a law, would find themselves very much worse off than they are now. I do not believe that the cotton raisers would refuse to enter into combinations to hold their cotton for a higher price. There is nothing in this bill to prevent that. If there is an intention to prevent combinations of any kind to regulate the price, it ought to apply to the cotton raiser just as well as to the cotton buyer or the cotton seller.

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks a conspiracy or combination can be entered into between 5,000,000 people and be made effective?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not understand that there are 5,000,000 people engaged in the raising of cotton.

Mr. BURLESON. There are more than 5,000,000 people engaged in the cultivation of cotton.

Mr. MADDEN. The people who control cotton in the South, or wherever it is grown, have organizations through which they assemble their cotton in warehouses and hold it for a time when they are assured that they can sell it for a higher price than they could sell it for if it was not so held.

Mr. BURLESON. And I want to assure the gentleman that never has one of those organizations or combinations proven effective.

Mr. FOSTER rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the people generally should and desire to encourage legitimate business of every kind. I see no objection to any man who owns and desires to sell a million bushels of corn or a thousand bales of cotton to be delivered some time in the future at a certain price. I see no objection to a man who desires to buy a million bushels of grain or a thousand bales of cotton or any commodity and having it delivered at a future time, but I do not believe it is encouraging the legitimate business of the country to go onto the board of trade and put up your money and bet whether cotton will go up 2 cents a pound or down 2 cents a pound in the next three months. I do not believe that it encourages the grain raisers of this country and I do not believe that it helps the consumer of bread in this country for men to go on the board of trade in Chicago, New York, or any other city and bet their money that grain will go up or down, as the case may be, in the next 30 days. These men have no intention of delivering the property, but really bet as to what the price will be. And so I think that this bill which is under consideration at this time permits legitimate transaction in the buying and selling of cotton, but will have a good effect in stopping gambling on boards of trade.

But I would like to see this bill go further and include other farm products, so that there might not be that gambling in those commodities, too. You take the traders in the city, those who speculate on the board of trade, and they can not always speculate among themselves, because if they do it is only trading dollars. They must reach out into the country and gather in what they call the "lambs" and shear them and get a crop of "wool" to replenish the treasury of each and every one of them. And so we see all over this country encouragement coming from these traders, holding out great inducements and issuing market letters as to what the market is likely to do. If he is trading on the board of trade, if he is what is called a "bull," he is always saying that the price in 30 days is going to be higher, and the proper thing to do to make money is to buy wheat or some other commodity, as the case may be. If he is a bear, he believes the price will go down.

I do not know, but I suppose between the bulls and bears on the board of trade there is about as much money made on one side as there is on the other. Sometimes I have thought that the bulls would "bull" the price for a little while, and then they would get what they could from the bears, and the lambs would think the prices were going up and they could make a lot of money, and they would put up their cash and the price would go down, and the "lambs" out in the country would get "sheared."

So let us have honest, legitimate trading. Let us encourage honest trading, but let us stop the gambling in cotton, wheat, oats, or any other farm product. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, the object and purpose of the bill now under consideration is to mitigate and minimize the evils growing out of what is commonly called and known as dealing in "cotton futures."

It is claimed by the opponents of the bill that the dealing in cotton for future delivery is a legitimate and necessary business, and that to prevent the buying and selling of cotton for future delivery will be an irreparable injury to both the producer and manufacturer of cotton. As thus stated, I am wholly in accord with the position of the apponents of this bill I will not if I know it support any bill that has for its object and purpose the prevention of sales and purchases of cotton for future delivery. I think speculation by way of buying and selling any product, whether agricultural or manufactured, whether for immediate consumption or for the purpose of holding the product for a time, hoping thereby to make a profit by an advance in price, is entirely legitimate and a benefit to producer and consumer alike.

The cotton crop of the United States matures and is gathered almost entirely during the months of September, October, and November, while it takes the whole 12 months of the year to manufacture the cotton thus harvested in 3 months. If it was wholly unprofitable for anyone to buy cotton except the manufacturer, he would have the cotton producer at his mercy.

Cotton, as a farm product, differs from almost all other crops grown on the farm. It is the only great crop produced that has no consumptive farm value. Cotton, without going through some form of manufacture, which the grower can not, as a rule, give it, can not be used by the grower for any purpose whatever. Corn, wheat, rye, oats, hay, and many other farm products can be used by the grower profitably on the farm where such articles are produced, without going through any stage of manufacture whatever, but cotton, without passing through some form of manufacture, which the farmer is not prepared to give it, can not be used for any purpose by the producer.

The great market effect of this condition with respect to cotton must not be overlooked. By reason of this fact the entire crop of cotton is a weight upon the money supply of the country, as every bale must be sold in order that the producer may realize any benefit from it whatever.

This is not the case with wheat, rye, oats, corn, or hay. While I have not examined the statistics and can not, of course, claim absolute accuracy, I am confident that if cotton is excluded at least 50 per cent of all other farm products can be consumed profitably without going through any stage of manufacture that is not or can not be furnished by the producer. Therefore it must follow that cotton is twice as sensitive to market conditions, both natural and artificial, as are the other products of the farm.

The corn grown and used by the farmer on his farm is never in any sense an actual weight upon the market. He does not have to sell it in order to utilize its value to him. This is true with all products of the farm which are consumed in whole or in part without passing through any stage of manufacture. But if a farmer grows only one bale of cotton on a 500-acre farm, he must sell it in order to realize any benefit from it. Cotton thus having no home farm consumptive uses is wholly an article of active trade and commerce and is thus necessarily affected by supply and demand, interest rates, insurance, commissions, and trade charges to an extent exceeding that of any of the other great crops of the country by at least 100 per cent. Therefore the cotton producer must necessarily be much more a victim to the evils of market manipulation of his crop than is possible for the growers of the other great staple crops of this country. While this is true, I do not want to be understood as being opposed to any legislation looking to the eradication of the evils of future dealing in any and all farm products. I am only pointing out to the House why I think it is more imperative to pass legislation of this kind with reference to cotton as a separate and distinct measure. I shall join in like efforts as to grain and other farm products.

Mr. Speaker, as I have said before, I have no objection to the buying of cotton to be delivered in the future. I think it ought to be encouraged. I am neither a cotton grower nor spinner; but I find myself passing by a farm and see 10 bales of cotton on that farm. I ask the owner, "Are you going to sell that cotton?" He tells me no. Says he does not need the money, and that he is going to hold his cotton for six months; that he believes it will be worth more money then than at the time I offer to purchase. That farmer by his action becomes an investor and holds his cotton off the market at a time when it might aid in depressing the price. He is a benefactor to all other farmers who are not able to hold their cotton, and who are thus benefited by the action of their brother producer, although this farmer by holding his cotton may at the end be the six months have to sell for less than he could have realized by selling to me.

Now, suppose this farmer instead of holding his cotton had dumped it on the market at that time; he would have aided to that extent the declining prices then prevailing, and by so doing he would have injured every other farmer in the United States who was compelled to sell his cotton. But this farmer, being out of debt and having money ahead, can sell his 10 bales of spot cotton and buy 10 bales for six months' future delivery on a market in part depressed by his inaction, and possibly make a profit out of his deal for himself on his futures. But his unfortunate brother farmers who could not hold were injured by him, but can not in any way share in the advance in futures, as they are not, as a rule, able to thus speculate even if so inclined. But the opponents of this bill advise all farmers to sell their actual farm-grown cotton, and thus depress the market for both spots and futures, and instead of holding farm-grown cotton buy Wall Street cotton and hold it.

Mr. Speaker, it is this Wall Street cotton that this bill is inimical to, and it will in no wise affect adversely the farm-grown cotton.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us suppose that the farmer I have mentioned sells his 10 bales of cotton to me. I am neither producer nor manufacturer. I am a speculator pure and simple. I think cotton will advance, and, so believing, I buy this cotton and pay the farmer $500 for it. I receive it, place it in storage, and hold it six months. What is the market effect of my action? I take 10 bales of cotton that would have been sold on the market out of the channels of trade, and thus make the supply of actual spot cotton pressing for sale less to that extent. The logical effect on the spot-cotton market is beneficial, and not only to the extent of the value of the 10 bales thus removed from sale, but upon every bale in all markets of the world. So I, although simply a speculator, have been a benefactor to every seller of spot cotton the world over. And at the end of the six months I may sell the 10 bales for a profit exceeding the interest on the money invested and be benefited by this pure speculative transaction. This was real, legitimate speculation and consisted in buying real, farm-grown cotton and holding it off the market at a time when the natural and unavoidable conditions were such that millions of bales of cotton were being pressed for sale in excess of the demand of the spinners or their ability to purchase. This bill will not prevent nor is it intended to prevent any such speculation.

Now, let us take the other side of the question. The Wall Street cotton grower says: "Do not buy that 10 bales of farm-grown cotton; you will have to pay $500 for it and be out of the use of that $500 for six months. But, instead, buy 10 bales of Wall Street cotton for six months' future delivery from me and I will only require you to put up as margin $2 per bale, or only $20 on the 10 bales instead of the $500 you will have to pay the farmer for his farm-grown cotton, and you will have $480 left of the $500 which you can invest in any other way that you desire; but if you desire, for the $500 you will have to pay for the 10 bales to the farmer, I will sell you 250 bales of Wall Street cotton for six months' future delivery." The Wall Street advocate goes on to argue with me that he will never call on me for anything more than the $500 unless cotton for future delivery should decline to an amount exceeding the $500, or exceeding $2 per bale, and even if it should I am told I will be called on for only $2 more per bale, and in no conceivable circumstances will I ever be called on to put up the $50 per bale I have to pay the farmer. The Wall Street cotton producer explains to me that if spot cotton goes up in six months so that I will make a profit on my $500 investment, being on only 10 bales, that my profits on 250 bales of futures will be twenty-five times as great. He further explains to me that if the market goes against me on my future deal that I can always sell out and stop my losses; that if I held spot cotton that it could not be used by anyone but a manufacturer; that if my 10 bales of farm-grown cotton begins to decline that I can not sell it at all, but will have to hold it until the manufacturers of spot cotton use up their supplies on hand. But that if I will buy his Wall Street grown cotton for future delivery, that inasmuch as his cotton is never used by spinners or manufacturers—in fact is never used at all for any purpose that farm-grown cotton can be used—that this Wall Street cotton can be sold at any time on five minutes' notice by telegraph or telephone or by any other means of communication; that it does not have to be inspected, weighed, or sampled; that in fact nothing has to be done that would have to be done if farm-grown cotton was being dealt in.

Mr. Speaker, the speculative spirit, get-rich-quick spirit, or, to be plain and candid and to use a term we all understand, the gambling spirit, seems to be inherent in all of us, and nine times out of ten the real speculator in actual farm products, by such arguments as I have detailed above, can be changed into a "gambler" in farm products, or rather a gambler in the name of farm products.

Mr. Speaker, if the evil of gambling in the name of farm products was confined to the individuals who gamble, barring the moral effects upon the public, we as a legislative body might excuse ourselves from any effort to prevent it. But if the evil effects of this character of transaction reaches out and takes in hundreds of thousands, yea millions, of producing farmers who are in no way parties to these transactions, I deem it our highest duty to exert our utmost efforts within constitutional limitations to abate the evil or to destroy it, root and branch, if we can do so. Therefore the next step, to proceed in logical order, is to ascertain whether or not the selling of cotton for future delivery, as conducted on the cotton exchanges in New York and New Orleans, is beneficial or injurious to the producers and manufacturers of cotton in this country.

It is impossible to sell more cotton for future delivery than is purchased for future delivery. Such a statement needs no demonstration; it is axiomatic. So, if these transactions were natural and conditions were equal and no law of economics violated, the effect of each sale would be neutralized by the effect of the purchase which made the sale possible. If these pretended contracts were intended to be executed by actual receipt and delivery of the cotton specified under terms and conditions equally fair and just to both seller and purchaser, their effect on the market would be nill. The future market, on the face of it, is always exactly balanced as the purchases and sales are and must be exactly equal in pounds, bales, and prices.

If delivery of each and every bale was actually intended and actually followed, it would make no sort of difference how often the same contract was transferred from one party to another, it could not and would not have any unnatural effect on the market any more than for a stock raiser in April to make a written contract to sell to a packer 100 head of beef steers to be delivered in the following December. This contract might be passed from one party to another a thousand times during that period of time and it would have no greater effect than if the same cattle had been sold and delivered a thousand times. Nor will a warehouse receipt for 1,000 bales of cotton have any unnatural effect on the cotton market if transferred a hundred times by way of sale and delivery, simply because the purchaser can look at the warehouse receipt and from it see just what kind of cotton is covered by the receipt, how many bales middling and weight of each, how many bales above middling and weight of each, how many bales below middling and weight of each. The warehouse receipt is simply an evidence of title to existing property. The contract is to deliver by the seller to the buyer 100 bales of cotton in the future, and although the cotton had not been planted, if both parties intended in good faith to execute the contract, and if, in fact, execution of such contract was the rule and not the rarest kind of an exception, no unnatural or injurious effects would follow. Mr. Speaker, if all contracts for future services or future deliveries of property were as often violated, or, to state it in another way, were as rarely executed as are contracts for future delivery of cotton made on the cotton exchanges. commerce and trade would be destroyed.

It is true that the margin of $2 per bale put up by buyer and seller of futures is forfeited and retained as damages to anyone who refuses to increase his margin when called on to do so; but if all kinds of contracts in business were as often broken as are those in cotton futures the claims for damages resulting therefrom would not so far compensate for such breaches of contracts as to permit the necessary business relations of commerce to continue.

Mr. Speaker, these contracts for cotton futures are made on the basis of middling cotton, so far as quality is concerned, and a bale is arbitrarily fixed at 500 pounds. A minimum contract is for 100 bales, or 50,000 pounds, and is made subject to the seller's option, who can deliver to the holder of the contract in month of delivery 50,000 pounds of middling cotton or any other kind of cotton other than middling deliverable on contracts on the exchange where the contract is made. There are now about 20 grades of cotton, as I now recall the facts, that are deliverable on contracts in the New York Cotton Exchange, so that the seller can deliver to the buyer the whole number of bales of any one kind of cotton deliverable under his contract, or he can deliver some of all grades deliverable. All the seller is compelled to do is to deliver 100 bales of cotton subject to delivery under his contract.

But if the cotton is above middling the seller does not have to deliver 50,000 pounds, but only enough pounds to equal in value 50,000 pounds of middling cotton. He may also deliver the whole 100 bales of cotton grading below middling, but in doing so he must deliver more than 50,000 pounds. He must deliver enough of this lower grade to be equal in value to 50,000 pounds of middling cotton. It would seem, in all fairness to the purchaser of one of these contracts, that he should get the actual market value of his 50,000 pounds of middling cotton at the time of the delivery provided for in the contract where other than middling is delivered, so that he would at least have as much cotton in market value as his contract called for in specific terms, so that the buyer could sell the cotton at least for as much as he was forced to give for it under the terms of the contract. But, Mr. Speaker, under the rules of the New York cotton exchange this is not the case.

Under the seller's option privilege he naturally will always deliver the grades of cotton least desirable to hold and in least demand at the time of delivery. Instead of determining the actual market value of the grades delivered other than middling, under the rules of the New York Exchange, the seller is permitted to deliver at a price fixed by a committee of the exchange, it may be 6, 8, or 10 months prior to the date when the actual delivery has to be made. This is called the system of fixed differences. If the differences were made by the committee in accordance with actual market conditions existing at the time the committee acted these variations may not remain the same for one month. If the revision committee fixed these differences in the month of September and a great tropical storm, as is often the case, visits the Gulf States, it will cause so great a damage to the quality of the cotton in the fields as to cause a much larger per cent of the crop to run below middling than was the case when the differences were fixed as to cause a wide decline in all grades below the contract grade by reason of the great increase of low-grade cotton. In such a case the seller would naturally deliver the lower grades, as he could get them at a lower price compared to middling than is provided in his contract, so that if the buyer should on the day of delivery sell this low-grade cotton he would suffer a loss. Naturally those who want farm-grown cotton for manufacturing purposes will steer clear of any such market as the New York Cotton Exchange provides. The rules of the New York Cotton Exchange makes that market attractive to any and all kinds of overvalued grades of cotton for purposes of delivery on contracts.

The small cash margin required to be put up by buyers and sellers of cotton on the New York and New Orleans exchanges for future delivery is conclusive proof that actual delivery is not expected. If middling cotton for a month, six months ahead of month of sale is as low as 10 cents per pound, the value of a 500-pound bale would be $50, and $2 cash margin would be only 4 per cent of the value of the cotton. That 4 per cent cash margin is the only guaranty the member of the cotton exchange who buys or sells the cotton has that the seller will deliver or that the purchaser will accept the delivery and pay for the cotton except the solvency of the parties to the transaction. Anybody, by mail, telegraph, or otherwise, under ordinary conditions can trade in futures by putting up the cash margin required, without any reference to his solvency. It is the rule if the market for the month dealt in is going down the purchaser is called on to increase his margin by putting up more cash. This call is usually made before his margin is exhausted, and if the purchaser does not increase his cash margin the member of the exchange who executed the order will sell out the contract before the cash margin is entirely exhausted, and the new purchaser takes the place of the one who was sold out on account of failure to respond in cash margin when called to do so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not an unusual thing for the price of cotton futures to fluctuate as much as a dollar a bale in one hour's time. In fact, on the opening of the exchange at 10 a. m. the price of futures often opens a dollar higher or lower per bale than they closed the day before. Now, would any safe, conservative banker loan money on actual cotton within 4 per cent of its cash value, with the borrower 500 or 1,000 miles away, and depend on the borrower protecting the bank by telegraph or telephone in case of violent fluctuations in the price of spot cotton? This is exactly what the member of the exchange does for the dealer in cotton futures.

It is clear that if any man who was buying cotton from a man whose solvency he did know and had to rely on a deposit in money in some bank to guarantee the actual delivery of the spot cotton six months ahead of the date of the contract he would require a much larger deposit in cash than $2 per bale. It must be clear to anyone that from the fact that the contract for future delivery of cotton is wholly at the option of the seller, and naturally operates to his advantage, that it is just as certain and as inevitable that these contracts are to the disadvantage of the purchasers of cotton for future delivery who want actual farm-grown cotton for purposes of manufacture.

Mr. Speaker, however we may view these contracts for future delivery of cotton under the existing rules of the New York and New Orleans exchanges, the conclusion is forced upon us that at least 90 per cent of all who sell these contracts have no purpose or desire to deliver actual cotton, even as per the advantageous terms of the New York contract; and it is equally clear that even a greater percentage of all persons who buy those contracts for future delivery of cotton have no purpose or desire to accept delivery of actual cotton as provided for in their contracts. Therefore it must follow that at least 90 per cent of all sales and purchases of cotton for future delivery in these exchanges are not made with any expectation or desire that actual cotton will be delivered and accepted in execution of said contracts. The hope and purpose of both parties to these trades is that the fluctuations in the price of futures will be in his direction, and that he may buy in or sell out his contract so as to make a profit before the month arrives in which the contract could be complied with by the terms of same.

The purchaser's expectation is to make a profit by getting the money put up as a margin by the seller, and a seller expects to make money by getting the margin, or part of it, put up by the purchaser. He has no thought of acquiring actual cotton and delivering it on his contract, but only hopes that the quotations for the future month he has dealt in will so decline as to enable him to buy in his contract for less than he sold it, and thus make a profit, which is paid out of the cash margin put up by the unfortunate purchaser. No wealth is created nor was any expected to be created. Such dealings are on all fours with the card table—the money of the players changes hands during the game and some players will have more money than they commenced with, but others will have exactly that much less.

Future dealings settled by the margin money put up are nothing more than gambling transactions as between the parties to them, but as to the growers and manufacturers of cotton they are much worse than the gaming table. The card gambler never injures anyone not a party to the game, but the cotton-future gambler affects adversely thousands and millions of cotton growers who are not parties to these future contracts.

The cotton exchanges open at 10 o'clock in the morning. Ten o'clock in the morning at New York means 9 o'clock in much the greater part of the cotton-growing belt of the United States. The moment the first price is made in futures in New York it is flashed over the wires to every spot-cotton dealer in the United States, and these quotations continue to be sent out every few minutes during the day; that is, until 3 o'clock p. m., when the exchanges close. If futures open firm and higher, purchasers of spot cotton are active in making purchases of farmers or anyone else who has actual cotton to sell. If the quotations for futures are considerably higher, the purchaser of spots may and often does advance the price he is paying for actual cotton.

But, on the other hand, if futures open lower and dull the purchaser of spots reduces his prices and is indifferent as to buying even at the reduced prices. As a rule cotton is delivered at country shipping points in the forenoon and usually sold before 1 o'clock p. m., and the market for spots is controlled absolutely by the sales of futures, as no spot quotations are posted by the cotton exchanges until 2 o'clock p. m., after the future market has been open for four hours and only one hour before the closing of the exchanges.

So, Mr. Speaker, it must be plain to anyone who makes an investigation of this subject that while the cotton-future gambler in his dealing has his eyes only on the cash stakes put up in the name of margins, his gambling in the name of cotton does have a very material effect on the prices of actual spot cotton in the hands of the grower or the manufacturer.

If no one but the professional cotton gamblers would patronize those exchanges they would largely cease to exist, but on account of the inherent disposition of man to speculate and gamble there seems to be an inexhaustible supply of men who think they can make money in future dealing and thus get rich quick and spend the rest of their days in easy living, so that a large crop of "lambs" are thus produced for fleecing by the professionals. These lambs are the innocent cause of all the evils growing out of future dealings in farm products.

At times when there are prospects of a short crop the facts are exaggerated, as crop-damage stories nearly always are, and these lambs begin to buy cotton futures from the professionals in New York and New Orleans. Nobody but a professional will sell to them. A lamb, and especially one in the South, never sells cotton futures. He always buys. He lives where he hears the tales of woe from the farmers morning, noon, and night. When he goes to make his purchases he never purchases only a few bales so as he can margin his trade heavily. He never thinks that futures can go down between the time of his purchase and the month of delivery. He usually thinks he knows all about cotton because he lives in the South, and he thinks these New York people, who have no knowledge of the crop conditions, with which he is familiar, are at a great disadvantage in dealing with him—a real, genuine cotton expert. So he goes in heavily and buys all he has the money to margin. He reasons there is no use in making two bites of a cherry. He will get rich in his first plunge and in a single trade. After the crop of lambs are sufficiently large on the bull side, the professionals in Wall Street, who like good country mutton, decide it is time to "make a killing." So some fine morning a big professional who has been selling cotton right along to these "sure-thing" lambs gets up and offers to sell 10,000 bales in any month. He has been in the public prints before—he is a Theodore Price or a Dan Sully. No other professional wants it. No bid is offered. This bit of market gossip is flashed over the wires to ever cotton broker and dealer and bucket shop in the land.

The effect is electrical. Futures begin to decline rapidly, margins are called, and the lambs become panicky, and orders burn up the wires to sell cotton futures at the market, down goes the price, and when it has sufficiently declined the professionals sell back to the poor deluded lambs the contracts they had purchased from them, and thus scoop in all the margin money the poor little bulls had put up, and then immediately the market steadies, and the professionals, having made "their killing," retire with no cotton or cotton contracts to bother them, but in possession of all the money put up as margins for cotton they sold, that was never intended to be delivered when sold. The crop-damage reports may have been real, and may get worse, but it did not prevent the manipulation of the market by the professionals, to the loss and ruin of new, inexperienced men, with a little money in hand, who think they can make many hundred per cent by dealing in cotton futures. Almost hundreds of cases have occurred where young men of good family and good character have been so crazed with the idea of getting rich quick that they have used funds not their own, and have become criminals and involved honored and respected families in financial ruin in order to save a son from a felon's cell. All laws are made for the protection of society, and it seems to me that it is our duty to protect the young men of our country from such temptation by refusing the use of the mails and the facilities of interstate commerce in aid of gambling transactions in farm products, which is so injurious to the producer and so demoralizing to the young men of our land and no benefit to any legitimate industry entitled to the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, is all the debate in favor of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not pay much attention to that, as to whether gentlemen were in favor of the bill or against it.

Mr. OLMSTED. Everybody who has spoken seems to be in favor of the bill. I am opposed to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for two minutes.

Mr. OLMSTED. That is rather short.

The SPEAKER. That is all the time there is left.

Mr. OLMSTED. Then I will yield my time.

Mr. HEFLIN rose.

The SPEAKER. There are only two minutes remaining. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] for two minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, It is really refreshing to those of us who come from the cotton belt, that section that produces two-thirds of the cotton of the world, to hear these gentlemen protest against our efforts to regulate the cotton exchanges, because they say that such regulation will injure the people that we represent.

The farmers of the cotton belt are almost unanimous in their demand for this legislation; but as I listened to the speeches made by the gentlemen who come from the exchange centers I was uneasy lest they convince some of you that these exchanges were instituted purely and wholly, singly and solely, for the benefit of the cotton producers. [Laughter and applause.] The cotton producer simply wants cotton used to fill contracts that name cotton. Men handling contracts that name cotton must call on the man who has real cotton to fill cotton contracts. Is there anything unfair about that? The exchange must become a real cotton exchange, where real buyers and real sellers transact legitimate business. Then the law of supply and demand will govern, as it should, an open, legitimate, and competitive market. That is all we want, gentlemen; and in closing this debate I ask you to vote for this meritorious measure. [Applause.]

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to correct two typographical errors in the bill: First, on page 4, line 21, to substitute the word "of" in place of the word "or."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the request.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 21, substitute the word "of" in place of the word "or."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, have we reached section 4?

Mr. MANN. No; we are making a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to make the typographical correction which has been stated. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman a question. Under the operation of the rule under which this bill is being considered it is impossible even for the friends of the bill to perfect it without unanimous consent. Is not that true?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Unfortunately it is true, because the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] consumed a very considerable part of the time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I consumed 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Then, on page 6, in line 16, I ask unanimous consent to strike out the word "my" and insert the word "by."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the request.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 16, strike out "my" and insert "by."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there are two prints of this bill. I should like to inquire where this is in the print of the bill which I have.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Near the end of section 6. "Or at which it is caused to be delivered my mail," should be "by mail." I am not sure that the mistake occurs in the original bill, but it does occur in the printed copy.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas if the word "in," in line 19, page 6, ought not to be stricken out and the word "is" inserted. That is a typographical error, is it not?

Mr. MANN. What is the language? There are two prints of the bill.

Mr. COOPER. It reads:

That the Postmaster General, upon evidence satisfactory to himself that any person in sending through the mails of the United States——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not yet submitted the previous request. If there be no objection, the word "my" will be changed to the word "by" in the place suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL].

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, is debate ended on this bill?

The SPEAKER. Debate is ended; yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is on the engrossment and third reading of this bill.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that the word "in" be stricken out and the word "is" substituted at the commencement of section 7.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. In line 19, page 6, there is a typographical error—"in" for "is."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall not agree that it is a typographical error. I object. It is manifest that we can not properly consider this bill to-day.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York object?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request that I be permitted to offer an amendment, of which I have heretofore spoken.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert on page 4, line 6, after the word——

Mr. MANN. I object to the reading of the amendment, and call for the regular order.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment. I did not know that the time had expired.

Mr. BURLESON. We would like to know what the amendment is.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD and Mr. MANN) there were—95 ayes and 25 noes.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. BEALL of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. BOOHER, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of John S. Swanke, invalid-pension case, Sixtieth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the cotton bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the cotton bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken on the cotton bill may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken on the bill may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following order:

Ordered, That the Senate, sitting for the trial of impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, adjourn until Friday, the 19th instant, at 12.30 o'clock in the afternoon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 20501. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange the site heretofore acquired for a United States immigration station at Baltimore, Md., for another suitable site, and to pay, if necessary, out of the appropriation heretofore made for said immigration station, an additional sum in accomplishing such exchange; or to sell the present site, the money procured from such sale to revert to the appropriation made for said immigration station, and to purchase another site in lieu thereof.

INTERNAL-REVENUE ACT RELATING TO MANUFACTURE OF CIGARS.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House consider the bill (H. R. 25741) amending section 3392 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by section 32 of the act of August 5, 1909.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the bill can not be read in the House. The gentleman should make a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25741) amending section 3392 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by section 32 of the act of August 5, 1909.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee in the chair.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks uanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is a very short bill, and I think it ought to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard and the Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3392 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by section 32 of the act of August 5, 1909, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3392. All cigars weighing more than three pounds per 1,000 shall be packed in boxes not before used for that purpose containing, respectively, 5, 10, 12, 13, 25, 50, 100, 200, 250, or 500 cigars each; and every person who sells, or offers for sale, or delivers, or offers to deliver, any cigars in any other form than in new boxes as above described, or who packs in any box any cigars in excess of or less than the number provided by law to be put in each box, respectively, or who falsely brands any box, or affixes a stamp on any box denoting a less amount of tax than that required by law, shall be fined for each offense not more than $1,000, and be imprisoned not more than two years: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed as preventing the sale of cigars at retail by retail dealers from boxes packed, stamped, and branded in the manner prescribed by law: Provided further, That each employee of a manufacturer of cigars shall be permitted to use, for personal consumption and for experimental purposes, not to exceed 21 cigars per week without the manufacturer of cigars being required to pack the same in boxes or to stamp or pay any internal-revenue tax thereon, such exemption to be allowed under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: And provided further, That every manufacturer of cigarettes shall put up all the cigarettes that he manufactures or has manufactured for him and sells or removes for consumption or use in packages or parcels containing 5, 8, 10, 15, 20, 50, or 100 cigarettes each, and shall securely affix to each of said packages or parcels a suitable stamp denoting the tax thereon, and shall properly cancel the same prior to such sale or removal for consumption or use, under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall prescribe; and all cigarettes imported from a foreign country shall be packed, stamped, and the stamps canceled in like manner, in addition to the import stamp indicating inspection of the customhouse before they are withdrawn therefrom."

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, the provision of this act which is new is contained on page 2 of the bill, in lines 14 to 22, inclusive, and reads as follows:

Provided further, That each employee of a manufacturer of cigars shall be permitted to use, for personal consumption and for experimental purposes, not to exceed 21 cigars per week without the manufacturer of cigars being required to pack the same in boxes or to stamp or pay any internal-revenue tax thereon, such exemption to be allowed under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Mr. Chairman, it has been the custom since cigars were first made in this country that the operatives should be allowed a certain number of cigars for their own use. Up until last September they have been allowed to take from the tobacco which they have given them to roll the cigars a certain amount to experiment with, to find out just the manner in which the cigars should be rolled which they were to make. They have also determined by smoking the tobacco whether it is of a proper strength and quality to use in the grade of cigars they were to make. The inexperienced employees were also taught how to roll cigars from this tobacco. The cigars allowed the operatives were not put in stamped boxes and no tax was paid upon them.

It has grown up as a custom that the factories will allow their operatives to take out a certain number of cigars—about three each day and six on Saturdays. This was permitted because in certain factories there were rules prohibiting smoking, either for hygienic reasons or because women and children were employed there The use of "smokers" had been the universal custom from the time the industry started until last September, when the Treasury Department made a ruling that no "smokers" should be allowed. There was a ruling made September 1, 1911, and a later one on September 15, and one on December 30 of the same year—printed in the hearings—all having the same object in view, to curtail the use of "smokers." Immediately the operatives began to feel that they had been deprived of what custom had given them, which they had come to regard as a part of their daily wage. Therefore bills were introduced by several Members having in view extending to the operatives by statute the privilege which had been enjoyed by them all along under the practice of the Internal Revenue Department up to last year.

Your Committee on Ways and Means gave an exhaustive hearing to the subject, and there appeared before it the representatives of the employees from many of our cities, and some of the manufacturers. Among those who addressed the committee were Mr. Henry Abrahams, president of the Massachusetts Central Labor Union, of Boston, Mass., Mr. Thomas F. Tracy, second vice president of the Cigar Maker's International Union of Boston, Mass., and representatives of the cigar makers of New York, Florida, and Connecticut. It was agreed upon by all parties, by both the manufacturers and the employees, that this custom was so well established that both parties desired to see it continued. The only point which was made against it was made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who objected to it because of the fear that continuing this exemption would enable a certain amount of tobacco to be taken out without paying a duty upon it; but after carefully considering the evidence your committee felt justified in reporting the bill which we now have before us. It was felt that the privilege had been in existence so long that its legal recognition was no more than fair to men and to the manufacturers, and there was no reason to suppose that it would be abused by men of such high integrity as are found among those engaged in the manufacture of cigars.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman explain what the provision beginning on line 22, page 2, relating to cigarettes and the method of packing them has to do with the legitimatizing of the custom of employees having an allowance of 21 cigars a week?

Mr. PETERS. That is in the law at the present time and there is no change made in the section to which the gentleman refers by this bill. The only change made is embodied in the provision commencing "Provided further," on line 14, and ending with the word "prescribe," on line 22. The provisions to which the gentleman refers are in the present law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The only change contemplated by the committee in the bill is the legitimatizing of the custom of making this allowance of cigars to the employee?

Mr. PETERS. That is exactly it.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. May I ask a general question? In this hearing before the committee in which the gentleman says both the manufacturers and the employees were represented, did they arrive at an agreement and is this bill presented here to-day satisfactory to both the manufacturers and the employees?

Mr. PETERS. The provisions of this bill met the demands of both the manufacturers and the employees as presented to the committee. This particular bill was not up for consideration at the time of the hearing. It became necessary to draw a new bill and meet some objections made to the bills which the committee was then considering, and I drew this bill and introduced it for the committee.

Mr. TILSON. But the provision changing the law was agreed upon?

Mr. PETERS. That provision meets the wishes of both parties.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. How many employees are there in the United States making cigars?

Mr. PETERS. I was coming to that in a minute. In the year 1909, which is the most recent year for which the statistics are available, there were on an average 139,578 employees in the United States in the cigar factories. This does not include clerks or salaried persons.

Mr. CANNON. If I understand this bill, it would allow each employee to have 21 cigars a week, where the tobacco was imported or where any kind of a tax was paid upon it, free of the tax. Is that right?

Mr. PETERS. For personal consumption and experimental purposes.

Mr. CANNON. Now, has the gentleman taken into consideration the question of allowing all clerks in dry goods houses, all employees who make up goods into clothing—in other words, have this law extended so that everybody might be accommodated and freed from the tax who is engaged in the handling or making up of various products?

Mr. PETERS. It is only the intention of the committee by this bill to legalize what has been the recognized custom of the cigar trade for many years, and they have not gone beyond that.

Mr. CANNON. If it be a good custom, and I am not expressing any opinion about it; but if it is good for 135,000 employees who make up tobacco, why is it not good for 5,000,000 or 10,000,000 employees that they should also be relieved of the burden for consuming that which they handle? What I want to get at, without expressing any opinion, is, did the committee consider the proposition that I have referred to of extending similar privileges to everybody who is engaged in any kind of industry?

Mr. PETERS. The committee certainly did not consider the question of extending the privileges of this act beyond those people who have already had this advantage.

Mr. CANNON. Why not? Is the act vicious; is the act bad in principle?

Mr. PETERS. The reason why we should not do it is that we are merely legalizing a custom which already exists. We are not making any new exemptions from taxation and not extending the exemption.

Mr. CANNON. A custom is legal itself if it be a good custom under common-law definition; then why is it necessary for this legislation if it be a custom?

Mr. PETERS. If the gentleman would be so good as to read the three rulings of the Treasury Department, made last September and December, to which I have referred, he will see that it is necessary to legalize this custom if it is to be continued.

Mr. CANNON. A custom if it is a good custom is the law, and if it is no longer a custom there is no necessity for this legislation. Is not that it?

Mr. PETERS. It was a custom until the rulings of the Treasury Department forbade it.

Mr. CANNON. Well, why not extend its advantages and have the burdens of taxation taken off of all the people equally?

Mr. PETERS. I have just explained why it makes legal a custom which has been in existence for 100 years or more. I will submit at this point a summary statement giving certain statistical facts in regard to the number of people employed in the manufacture of cigars and the revenue duties collected thereon.

The returns for the year 1909—most recent year available—show:

Average number of employees in cigar factories, wage earners only—does not include clerks or salaried people—139,578.

Of whom there were:

Men over 16 years of age, 69,392.

Women over 16 years of age, 66,338.

Children under 16 years, 3,848.

The internal-revenue tax on 1,000 cigars is $3.

The average cigar maker produces approximately 30,000 cigars annually, thus producing a revenue of $90. If he consumed 21 cigars a week, or 1,092 a year, the revenue would be decreased by a little over $3.

Estimating that 80 per cent of men over 16 smoke, they would consume in a year about 60,000,000 cigars.

On which there would be a revenue tax of 66,000 times $3 uncollected, or $180,000.

The maximum total loss is, then, $180,000.

Total internal-revenue tax on tobacco, 1911, $67,005,950.56.

Of which there was collected on cigars alone, $22,673,008.31.

These figures show the extremely trifling amount which these exemptions would affect in regard to the total amount of revenue received, and when we come to consider that 21 cigars a week has been allowed to those in the trade ever since the inception of the industry, you will see that the total amount of revenue which would be lost by this act would be inconsiderable indeed.

Mr. JAMES. There is no loss of revenue, because there has never been any revenue collected heretofore.

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. WHITE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. Does the gentleman include stogies in the use of the word "cigars"?

Mr. PETERS. I suppose they are included in the revenue department as cigars.

Mr. WHITE. They are not specifically referred to in cigars, and I desired to know whether they were included in the gentleman's statistics.

Mr. PETERS. I suppose so. I obtained these statistics from the Census Bureau. They have not yet been printed, and details are not, therefore, available.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I suppose, of course, the necessity for this legislation grows out of the recent ruling of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue?

Mr. PETERS. There were three rulings made in 1911 in the closing months, which took away from the operatives the privilege of smokers which heretofore existed, which made some action necessary.

Mr. SPARKMAN. All the other Commissioners of Internal Revenue from the beginning of the Government down to the present time made no such ruling; in other words, had recognized that practice?

Mr. PETERS. It was universally recognized until the recent ruling was made.

Mr. SPARKMAN. And the sole purpose of the present bill is to legalize the custom that has grown up under that practice for a good many years—a century, as you say?

Mr. PETERS. The sole purpose is to legalize the custom which had been recognized since the commencement of the trade.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would like to make the suggestion that I think your bill is simply more conservative than the custom that has grown up in the factories where the clear Habana cigars are made. I think the operatives there have been accustomed to take as much as 25 cigars a week. You provide for 21?

Mr. PETERS. We have done so. The custom has itself much to commend it. It gives an opportunity for the inexperienced to try their hand at preparing cigars. It gives an opportunity for the manufacturer to have his tobacco tested by his operatives and to find the exact value of that tobacco for the purpose which he wishes to make of it, and, in addition, this custom has become so general that the attempt to abolish it has brought forth strong objections and considerable hardship on the part of the men employed in this business.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee). Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PETERS. With pleasure.

Mr. BOWMAN. I see in the report of the committee, in the last paragraph of the letter signed by Commissioner Cabell, the following statement:

The only method by which a manufacturer may safely supply his employees with "smokers" is to pursue the course adopted by some of the large manufacturers, who for years have supplied their cigar makers and other employees with "smokers" from packages that have been marked, branded, and stamped in accordance with the law and regulations.

Does not the gentleman think it is better to have that practice followed by all the manufacturers?

Mr. PETERS. The manufacturer will not do that. We prefer to legalize the old custom.

Mr. BOWMAN. Does not the gentleman think that if they open it up in this manner it will be open to further abuse?

Mr. PETERS. The committee does not think so. The custom had been in use for years, and there was not brought to the committee any instance of an attempt to defraud the Government. The committee has full confidence in the intentions of the manufacturers and operatives, and I am sure if the gentleman had been at the hearings he would have seen from the representatives of the operatives who were there that no advantage would be taken of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, in its effort to reestablish this custom your committee report the bill and hope for speedy and favorable action by the House.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PAYNE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is recognized.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, it is true this bill has received the approval of the manufacturers, although disapproved by some of them who prefer to do their business in a straight, legal way, according to the present law. Of course, the cigar makers are in favor of it, because it furnishes them cheaper cigars to smoke, and some manufacturers are in favor of it because it saves the tax on cigars, and they are able to mix up in some way the tax on the cigars and the wages of the employees and get a little benefit out of it. And for that reason both of them are in favor of the bill.

The practice was prohibited by the old law, because they thought it was necessary in framing the old law to provide some safety for the high revenue that was exacted upon manufactured cigars. The manufacturers were charged with the amount of tobacco and with the probable number of cigars it would make, and that was one check which the Commissioner of Internal Revenue had upon them, and one means that he had to exact the full tax.

The tobacco goes into the manufacture of cigars, as you all know, and the cigars can not come out of the factory unless they are put up into boxes, and the internal-revenue authorities close the boxes so they can not be opened without breaking the tax stamp that is pasted upon the box.

Now, this practice of free cigars for employees grew up in contravention of the law. The men would take tobacco and make it up into cigars and smoke them while they were doing their work. Probably no great amount of tobacco was consumed in this way. The proprietors and manufacturers allowed it to be done, and the cigar makers, of course, were anxious to have the practice continued. But, like all such practices, it got a little over the borders of moderation, and they began to take home with them the cigars on which no revenue tax had been paid. The practice increased and the number of cigars taken out increased from time to time until the practice became a serious drag on the revenue, the commissioner said $1,000,000 per year.

It was on account of this fact that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, if I remember the hearings correctly, about two years ago, decided to enforce the law.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It was last year, in September.

Mr. PAYNE. Since that time he has enforced the law, and has required that no cigars should go out of the factory. If I remember correctly the evidence taken by the committee some time ago, it was to the effect that no cigars should be used in the factory and smoked unless the internal revenue was paid according to law. That was very strict.

When that regulation was put into effect, of course there was a muttering of discontent, and finally it grew to such importance that the workmen and employees appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means during the present year and, as my friend says, a number of bills were introduced to relieve this situation. The committee had the Commissioner of Internal Revenue appear before them, and he was examined fully upon this subject. He was asked if the revenue could be protected if legislation of this sort were enacted. He said he thought that if permission were given to exempt from the payment of the tax only such cigars as were smoked upon the premises by the employees it would not make any great inroad upon the revenue, and in his opinion it would be sane legislation. I do not know whether he said just that, but, adopting the language of the day, I will include that word "sane."

This arrangement was made, of giving 3 cigars a day to each employee, or 21 during the week. He said that if these employees were allowed to take the cigars from the premises without their being packed in boxes and stamped and the revenue paid upon them, you might just as well take the revenue tax off of cigars and tax something else in order to raise revenue. He put it in one sentence as strongly as that. Perhaps that was a little stronger than he meant it to be. But at any rate, he said it would result in a great loss of revenue if that practice were legalized.

That is the reason I am opposed to this bill in its present form. I do not object to allowing the makers of cigars to use such tobacco as is given them by their employers on the premises, but I do object to having the cigars made from it taken away, because that opens the door to temptation to those employees and to fraud on the revenue. I am afraid that if the employees are allowed to get the cigars out of the shop they will not always be inclined to use them for their own personal use. There will probably be people outside who will be tempted to buy the cigars of them. Of course the United States Government can not follow these employees beyond the doors of the factory to see whether the cigars are used in that way or not. The espionage by the Government authorities is in the factory. Beyond that they have no control over the revenue, and it is not safe to let the cigars go out in a wholesale manner.

I do not know whether the gentleman's calculations are correct or not as to the number of employees and the number of cigars that are to be used. I do not know whether the employees would use all the 21 cigars allowed in a week or not. I know that a calculation was made in the committee, and the number ascertained was enormous, and the amount of revenue was much larger than $185,000, as we calculated it then. I have not looked at it since. I have not had the report of the hearings, but I recall it was much larger than $185,000.

Now, why not amend this bill, and confine it to cigars used upon the premises by these employees, and not allow them to take any out, and not endanger the revenue? Why should you endanger the revenue against the protest of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who has the collection of the revenue under his jurisdiction? I think a very simple amendment to this bill would guard against that, and then, as far as I am concerned, I should not have any objection to its passage, although I believe, going away back to the foundation, that we ought not to make any exemption, and we ought not to allow anybody any special privilege in regard to these things. I am against special privileges, whether to rich people or poor people, whether to the laboring man or the capitalist. I do not believe in special privileges to anybody. I hear a great many people talk glibly about special privileges, and then see them go and vote to give special privileges to a special class.

I know that in the manufacture of beer in breweries employees are allowed to drink all the beer they can drink on the premises, but they are not allowed to take it out in bottles or in cans and drink it somewhere else, or peddle it out to other people to drink.

Bear in mind that the only safeguard the Government has is, in the first place, in weighing in the tobacco into the factory; then, after that is done, to see that the proper amount of cigars come out of the factory and pay the tax. If you allow them to come out in any way except in boxes properly stamped, you run the risk of losing the revenue and of giving some one free cigars, as against all the other citizens of the United States. Confine it to the employees in the cigar factory, and do not go outside of that.

I do not care to talk longer upon this, Mr. Chairman, because I have said, perhaps, all I want to say, and because I understand the gentleman from Wisconsin wishes to make an hour's speech.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I should like to ask if the Government does not require 1,000 cigars out of 25 pounds of tobacco?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; that is the minimum. They require that as a minimum, and if they make any more cigars than that, they can not go out of the factory unless they pay a tax on them by putting them in boxes and paying for the stamps.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman has admitted that this practice has been going on for a great many years.

Mr. PAYNE. It has grown into a practice.

Mr. SPARKMAN. How will the Government lose by legalizing a practice that has been going on? In other words, how will it lose that which it has never been collecting?

Mr. PAYNE. It was because the revenue was diminishing on these things, and the commissioner found he was not collecting the proper amount of revenue, that he called attention to the law and the strictness of it, and enforced it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I read the hearings very carefully, and I do not recall that the commissioner found that he was losing or that the practice was growing to any extent at all.

Mr. PAYNE. You will remember that his experience was such under that old practice that he protested most vehemently against changing the law and allowing them to take the cigars out of the factory.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Right or wrong, this present commissioner did that which his predecessors never did. He did it, not because the practice was growing, but because he thought it ought to be stopped.

Mr. PAYNE. There is no question but that he was right on the law, and right in the interest of collecting revenue, and his attention was called to it for that purpose.

Mr. COOPER. It is true, I believe, that this practice of smoking three cigars a day or taking them out is a very old custom; but does not the gentleman from New York think that the language of the pending bill is sufficient to prevent any abuse? It provides, in line 15, page 2—

That each employee of a manufacturer of cigars shall be permitted to use, for personal consumption and for experimental purposes, not to exceed 21 cigars per week without the manufacturer of cigars being required to pack the same in boxes or to stamp or pay any internal-revenue tax thereon.

Now follows the language to which I wish to direct the gentleman's attention:

Such exemption to be allowed under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Would not that language, which confers plenary powers on the Secretary of the Treasury to pass rules and requirements to be observed by these employees, suffice to prevent abuse?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think so, for this reason: If my friend from Wisconsin will allow me to make a personal example, I think if he was administering it that he would let the cigars go off the premises, and if I was administering it I would not allow them to go off. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this suggestion: Suppose, in line 16, after the word "use," we insert the words "on the premises of the manufacturer," so that it will read "that each employee of the manufacturer of cigars shall be permitted to use on the premises of the manufacturer for personal consumption and for experimental purposes," and so forth.

Mr. COOPER. But I can see how an employee might want to take home a cigar to smoke after supper, the same as does the man who has ample money to pay for cigars. It strikes me that there is no great hardship coming to the Government of the United States, nor to anybody else, by permitting the employee to take the cigar home and smoke it.

Mr. PAYNE. The officials of the revenue department do not agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. COOPER. The internal-revenue official thinks that there will be a loss of revenue. But if the internal-revenue officials and the Secretary of the Treasury get together and formulate rules and regulations so that an employee can not take out more than three cigars, I do not see how it could make any difference to the revenue whether they are smoked on the premises or taken home and smoked. Under proper rules and regulations the interests of the Government will not be injuriously affected.

Mr. PETERS. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that the rules in certain factories prohibit smoking on the premises for hygienic reasons, and it would be impossible to provide that they must be smoked on the premises.

Mr. PAYNE. That makes the privilege all the worse. If the proprietors want it done, they could arrange a room for the smoking of the cigars. There is no hardship in that, and I do not think that we ought to injure the revenue every time some one comes along and says that it would be more pleasant to have it done thus and so. I think that it is conceding a good deal to concede what has been done already.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman from New York speaks about injuring the revenue. Is it not a fact that from the beginning the receipts from the tax on tobacco have increased constantly?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, certainly.

Mr. COOPER. And yet this practice has been going on.

Mr. PAYNE. The consumption has increased; there is no doubt about that. The legitimate consumption in the factory has increased and also the carrying away of cigars has increased, and still the revenue is increased, because the consumption has increased. We are a country of generous smokers. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have the very highest regard for the opinion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in reference to the revenue. I am inclined to believe that the custom which has prevailed for many years in the cigar manufacturing business might well continue to prevail, although it is a pure case of special privilege to a few and a direct subsidy to the employees. If the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle can overcome their consciences without hesitation after just passing a platform against special privileges, then passing a bill almost immediately to provide a special privilege and grant a subsidy, I am not going to stand in the way.

Mr. PAYNE. Has the gentleman overlooked the fact that passing the platform and passing the bill had a connection, each one of them, with votes and voters? I do not mean to say that any gentleman was influenced by any such consideration, but it does have a direct bearing on both.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No consideration at all but the public welfare.

Mr. JAMES. Is that what inspired the gentlemen on the Ways and Means Committee to support the bill, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and others?

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to his own judgment in individual cases.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I am strongly in favor of this bill, which embodies the salient features of several bills that have been introduced, one of which I had the honor of presenting. The principal point in the bill and the one in which the cigar makers and manufacturers are interested is that which exempts from the revenue tax 21 cigars a week for each employee for his own use, consumption, or experimental purposes.

The arguments presented against the bill by the department are not good and will not stand up against strict scrutiny as to facts or motives. While the object of the department may be to secure all the revenue possible, the fact that until the great Tobacco Trust had secured control of so many factories no effort had been made to collect the tax on the "smokes," so called, might lead one to suspect that the trust factories were entirely in harmony with the rule to enforce the tax in the belief that it would put an end to the practice and save to trust uses a small quantity of tobacco used in making the free smokes—in other words, another phase of trust avarice.

For more than 100 years, or since the beginning of the cigar-making industry, cigar makers have been permitted to make, in their own time, and without charge for stock, cigars for their own use and consumption. These have been commonly known as "smokers." The stock used generally has been the tobacco that is not fit to be used in cigars that are offered for sale, or, in others words, the tobacco has been damaged stock. The cigar manufacturer has never objected to this custom, which has really become an unwritten law in the business, but a comparatively recent ruling of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has made it obligatory on the part of the manufacturer to pay for all "smokers" made by the cigar makers. This drastic ruling has caused great dissatisfaction. The manufacturers are opposed to it as well as the men. The men look upon it as a right, established by long custom, and they will not be deprived of it. In my opinion, the ruling is uncalled for, and the men, believing that an established privilege is being denied them, will still continue to have their "smokes," and this implies no dishonesty on the part of the men.

The Government is not out a dollar by this custom, for the tobacco used by them would not be manufactured into cigars upon which the tax would be paid. This bill provides that a very reasonable number, namely, 3 a day, or not to exceed 21 per week, be allowed each employee. This provision as to the number has the approval of manufacturers and cigar makers alike. My bill was introduced by me at the request of several large cigar manufacturers in my district, and as this bill embodies the main feature of mine and the only one of interest to the cigar makers and manufacturers I give it my hearty approval.

As most clearly proving the justice of this measure I desire to quote from the statement made before the Ways and Means Committee by President G. W. Perkins, of the Cigar Makers' International Union. Among other things Mr. Perkins said:

The cigar maker, in order to become proficient in the making of cigars so as to get the best possible results and to produce cigars that would smoke properly and give proper satisfaction, out of necessity had to test them by actual smoking of his own work. Tobacco is perhaps the most peculiar in its nature of any plant grown. It has to be handled properly by the cigar maker in order to give the best results. The cigar maker can better judge the manner in which to make cigars properly by personally smoking one, and in doing so is helping not only the customer but the manufacturer as well. Tobacco is one of the hardest things in the world to correctly judge. Almost any other commodity can be judged by the test of seeing, feeling, and tasting, while tobacco has to be seen, felt, tasted, and smoked before a correct judgment can be reached. Thousands of manufacturers located everywhere experience great difficulty in correctly judging tobacco. They have asked the cigar maker to roll it, smoke it, and pass judgment on the quality of the tobacco. This is particularly true in the smaller shops. Thousands of times that thing has been asked of me. These two facts—that is, the testing of the workmanship and the tobacco by actual smoking at the request of the manufacturer—inaugurated the so-called smoker privilege, which has existed in our country for about 100 years. We did not start it. This privilege grew out of a commercial necessity, which exists to-day to a greater extent, if anything, than it ever did in the past. The few smokes the cigar makers get are of greater benefit to the consumer and to the manufacturer than to the cigar maker.

This is the best evidence of putting in the bill the "experimental purposes" provision and shows the benefit of the proposed measure to the manufacturer and consumer.

That there will be no abuse of this exemption is assured by the character of the average cigar maker. I quote from the testimony of Mr. Sol. Sontheimer, of Hartford, Conn., an experienced and reputable cigar maker, on this point:

At no time in my experience—and I have worked as a cigar maker for 35 years at the bench—can I recall a single internal-revenue commissioner that has so construed the law that would practically deprive us of a custom that has been in existence for something like 100 years. We cigar makers that work at the bench have a sense of propriety. Particularly is this true in teaching and telling our colleagues what we presume to be the fair conduct in relation to their employer's property, because we are aware of the fact that to abuse that privilege might possibly lead up to a point where grave complications might arise and we be denied those privileges. For that reason, to teach amongst the craft that particular point upon which I am trying to lay stress, that we cultivate the idea of honesty in the removal of this product, as a result of which the commissioner claims the Government loses a large amount of revenue.

I have a number of letters from different manufacturers in New England. I am working for one that employs something in the neighborhood of 100 cigar makers, and he, like all other manufacturers that I have come in contact with in New England, favors some legislation along this line, such as the Reilly bill.

There is every reason in justice why this bill should pass; there is no good reason yet shown why it should not; and I feel confident this wise and very moderate provision will soon be on the statute books.

Mr. MANN. I would be willing to confess that if there were no voters and no other persons involved I would not be in favor of the bill, because there would be no occasion for its passage.

Mr. Chairman, I would like now to make an inquiry. A few moments ago the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] desired to address the House upon some subject, where he was entitled to speak in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union when considering a revenue bill. I understand that my friend from Texas [Mr. HENRY] prevailed upon the gentleman from Wisconsin to withhold his address this afternoon. I promised at the very first opportunity to get the gentleman from Wisconsin an opportunity to address the House. I did that in my capacity as floor leader upon this side of the House representing in that respect to a certain extent the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SABATH. And his party?

Mr. BERGER. No; not his party.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not understand that the gentleman from Illinois contended for an instant that he represented the party that caucuses in the person of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MANN. I do not attend the caucuses of the party; although the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself, as nominal heads of parties in the House, frequently confer. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. And conspire against us.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Texas as to what his purpose is when we get into the House, for the balance of the afternoon, after the House finishes this bill?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will state that I had one or two special rules that I would like to present, but only one in particular that I shall insist upon, and that is a resolution broadening the powers of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries in regard to the investigation of the Shipping Trust.

Mr. MANN. To that I have no objection, but I do not think it would be fair to the House to bring up at this time rules in reference to other matters.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I shall withhold all other special rules this afternoon.

Mr. MANN. May I inquire further whether there will be any objection after we get back into the House this afternoon to at that time granting an hour to the gentleman from Wisconsin, to be consumed on Thursday next?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. None in the world. I have assured the gentleman from Wisconsin that I would be glad to have him get the hour next Thursday, and there will be no difficulty about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. PAYNE (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the second reading of the bill be dispensed with and that we now proceed to amend it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the second reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 16, after the word "use," insert the words "on the premises of the manufacturer."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to say anything further on that amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Would not the effect of this amendment be to practically defeat the purpose of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. Not at all. It reverts to the original practice in the shops, which has grown into an abuse.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Have they not now adopted regulations that prevent the smoking on the premises in many instances?

Mr. PAYNE. They had not at the time of the hearings.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, I think so. I think there are a number of factories that do not permit smoking on the premises; more than 50 per cent, as I remember.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would nullify the purposes of the bill. According to the testimony of the witnesses before the committee, in many factories no smoking is permitted at the present time, on account of the welfare of the employees. Women are employed as well as men, and hygienic conditions have rendered it necessary in the modern factories to prevent smoking, and this amendment, if adopted, would do away in great part with the benefits of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of the bill as a new section the following:

"It shall be unlawful after the passage of this act to issue or give away with any cigars or cigarettes offered for sale any trading stamps or premium. Anyone violating this section shall be fined for each and every offense not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment not more than six months, or both."

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment. I will reserve the point of order if the gentleman wishes to speak on it.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, in the last 10 years the Tobacco Trust through its foster child, the United Cigar Stores Co., by the adoption of a scheme which is, in fact, nothing more or less than doing business under false representation, has, as no doubt you are aware, driven out of business in all the large centers the majority of the independent and small cigar manufacturers and dealers. Not that they manufacture better cigars or sell them at a lower price, but because through a certain misleading method which they have adopted, known as the "profit-sharing" plan, they have led the public to believe that they are giving them part of their profits by issuing to each customer with each and every purchase certain coupons and certificates which will entitle them, after they accumulate a large number, to a very valuable present or premium, while, in fact, Mr. Chairman, the value of these coupons and certificates is very small, and frequently, after such misled customer has smoked himself nearly to death, he will receive an article which is of no value to him. But inasmuch as the large percentage of the American people insist on being humbugged and fooled the scheme has enabled the United Cigar Stores Co. to so intrench itself that the independent honest dealer or dealers have no chance to compete against this giant monopoly.

In my own city I have seen hundreds of old and crippled men and feeble women who formerly secured a livelihood by engaging in the business of selling tobacco and cigars driven out of business by the unfair and unjust competition of this vicious monopoly.

To-day the independent dealers of this country are at the mercy of this combination, as it is impossible for them to compete with this trust, as they, the small independent dealers, living in the vicinity of their places of business, conduct their business honestly and do not and could not afford to practice tricks and deceit upon the community, as the unscrupulous trust managers do, who care not what they do as long as they secure business, and can show an increase of business to the board of directors.

The amendment that I have offered will, I believe, in a great measure, if adopted, put a stop upon this method of doing business and will give the independent dealers a chance and an opportunity to exist, as it will put them on equal terms with the trust, believing that the independent dealers and small cigar manufacurers can compete with the United Cigar Co. and can give the people better cigars, better tobacco for the same price that the United Cigar Stores can. My reason in believing this is based on the fact that in the majority of instances the trust has rented the most prominent corners, for which it is obliged to pay tremendously high rents, and pays its officers extremely high salaries, thereby being under heavy expense, where, on the other hand, the independent small cigar dealer or manufacturer is not obliged to do so and can do business on a smaller margin. Not having to pay these enormous rents and high salaries, it is plainly evident that it is not necessary for him to make as great a profit and enables him to give a better article at the same price, as the trust must sell a poorer grade with which to give their "profit-sharing" coupons and certificates, and to provide for large dividends.

I feel confident that if these trust-owned stores would be deprived of this special advantage, be prevented in continuing these misleading offers, and be obliged to do business on the same basis, that within a very short space of time all those who have been obliged to give up their places of business would again return and be in a position to earn a fair living for themselves and those dependent upon them. By accepting my amendment we will eliminate a great deal and put a stop to the abuses on the part of the great Tobacco Trust. I hope that the gentleman from Massachusetts will not press his point of order, hoping that he will recognize and appreciate the fairness of my amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I did not hear very well the gentleman's amendment when read. Does his amendment include coupons?

Mr. SABATH. That is what I meant—trading stamps and coupons.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I mean the coupon that is placed inside the package as well as the coupon or the trading stamp that is handed outside the package.

Mr. SABATH. I do not know whether that hurriedly drawn amendment provides for coupons, but that was my intention.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman knows there are two different ways of working this thing. One is by a coupon which is placed inside the package and the other is by a trading stamp which is handed to the purchaser at the time of his purchase.

Mr. SABATH. I believe my amendment would cover both of those cases.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman intends to cover both cases?

Mr. SABATH. I do; that is my intention.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, there is a bill before the House at this Congress containing the provisions of the amendment offered by my colleague from Illinois. I am obliged to insist upon my point of order, as I fear that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois would, if it were accepted and put in the bill, seriously jeopardize its passage at this time, and I have too much at heart the granting of this relief to the employees of the cigar factories to take any chances of defeating the bill by adding this amendment.

Mr. SABATH. Well, the gentleman has not stated his point of order on which he relies.

Mr. PETERS. My point of order is that it is not germane to the bill.

Mr. SABATH. I think it is germane to the bill. It adds simply another provision to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois is not germane to the bill, and therefore sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 24741, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PETERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as several gentlemen have asked to extend remarks, I ask unanimous consent that remarks on this subject may be extended in the RECORD if submitted within five legislative days.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not know whether I ought to allow this to be done or not. I am not in favor of electioneering in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. However, out of good nature, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. The request is that all Members shall have the right to publish remarks in the RECORD for five legislative days.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object.

INVESTIGATION OF SHIP LINES, ETC.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 587) from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] offers a privileged resolution (H. Res. 587), which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 587 (H. Rept. 1010).

Resolved, That the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries be, and is hereby, empowered and directed to make a complete and thorough investigation of the methods and practices of the various ship lines, both domestic and foreign, engaged in carrying our over-sea or foreign commerce and in the coastwise and inland commerce, and the connection between such ship lines and railroads and other common carriers, and between such lines and forwarding, ferry, towing, dock, warehouse, lighterage, or other terminal companies or firms or transportation agencies, and to investigate whether any such ship lines have formed any agreements, understandings, working arrangements, conferences, pools, or other combinations among one another, or with railroads or other common carriers, or with any of the companies, firms, or transportation agencies referred to in this section, for the purpose of fixing rates and tariffs, or of giving and receiving rebates, special rates, or other special privileges or advantages, or for the purpose of pooling or dividing their earnings, losses, or traffic, or for the purpose of preventing or destroying competition; also to investigate as to what methods, if any, are used by such ship lines, foreign or domestic, and railroads and other common carriers, or of any of the companies, firms, or other transportation agencies referred to in this section, to prevent the publication of their methods, rates, and practices in the United States; also to investigate and report to what extent and in what manner any foreign nation has subsidized or may own any vessels engaged in our foreign commerce; also to investigate and report to what extent any vessel lines and companies, or any of the companies, firms, or transportation agencies referred to in this section, engaged in our foreign or coastwise or inland commerce, are owned or controlled by railway companies, by other ship lines or companies, or by any of the companies, firms, or transportation agencies referred to in this section, or by the same interests and persons owning or controlling railroad companies, ship lines, or other common carriers, or any of the companies, firms, or transportation agencies referred to in this section; and said committee shall further investigate whether the conduct or methods or practices of said foreign steamship lines are in contravention of our commercial treaties or in violation of our laws, and what effect said methods and practices have on the commerce and freight rates of the United States; and shall further investigate what effect such combinations, agreements, understandings, working arrangements, and practices of railroads and our coastwise and inland shipping lines, or of railroads and such shipping lines and any of the companies, firms, or transportation agencies referred to in this section, or of railroads and over-sea shipping lines, whether domestic or foreign, if any are found to exist, have on the commerce and freight rates of the United States, and whether the same are in violation of the laws of the United States.

SEC. 2. That said committee shall report to the House all the facts disclosed by said investigation and what legislation, if any, it deems advisable in relation thereto.

SEC. 3. That said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby empowered to sit and act during the sessions or recess of Congress at such place or places as may be found necessary and to require the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, rates, tariffs, and other documents, by subpœna or otherwise, to swear such witnesses and take their testimony orally or in writing.

SEC. 4. That said committee is hereby authorized to employ such counsel and experts and clerical and other assistance as shall be necessary to perform its duties hereunder.

SEC. 5. That the Speaker shall have authority to issue subpœnas for witnesses, upon the request of the committee, during the recess of Congress in the same manner as during the sessions of Congress.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I suppose gentlemen do not desire any explanation, inasmuch as the resolution is plain and speaks for itself. Still, if any Member is not satisfied with it, I will be glad to explain it.

Mr. MANN. I think it would be well to explain it generally.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will state in general terms that this is simply amendatory of resolution No. 425, and broadens that resolution to the extent that it takes into consideration certain wharf, dock, warehouse, and lighterage companies in order that the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries may investigate their affairs in connection with other matters that the House directed them to investigate under H. Res. 425. It broadens that resolution to that effect and that only. That is all there is to the resolution. I will be glad to answer any question about it.

Mr. ROBINSON. The former resolution related only to the shipping itself?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, this resolution calls for an investigation which is something in the nature of a commission, to make inquiry and report. We have the Immigration Commission, which was appointed some five years ago, designated to make an investigation and report on needed immigration legislation, spending about a million dollars of the public money. They have investigated and reported, and the committee of the House, as well as of the Senate itself, has acted on the report of the commission in part, and has now reported to this body a bill carrying into effect some of the recommendations of the report of that committee or commission. About June 1 I introduced a resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Rules, asking them to report out a special rule calling for the consideration at this session of the immigration bill. And before going into further commissions and investigations, I would like to inquire of the gentleman what investigation the Committee on Rules has made touching the resolution introduced by myself as well as by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], who reported the bill, looking to the bringing in of a special rule, for consideration before the House of the bill for further restricting alien immigration as reported by the committee?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, of course the gentleman will understand that this resolution relates to the shipping-trust investigation which has already been ordered. In regard to the bill to which the gentleman refers and the special rule, I will say that the Committee on Rules is giving very careful consideration to his rule, as they always do to anything coming from the gentleman from Georgia. And we will be sure to deliberate most carefully about it, and the bill will have every consideration to which it is entitled, coming as it does from the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Does the gentleman think that the consideration will be so long that it will not get out at this session of Congress?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I would not like to make any prophecy in regard to that matter. It is an important matter and certainly will be carefully considered.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Has the committee reached any conclusion that they will bring in a special report for the consideration of that bill?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will state that several conclusions have been arrived at by different members of the committee, and the chairman of the committee is endeavoring to bring the members together. As soon as we can assemble a quorum of the committee, the bill, as I have said, shall be thoughtfully considered.

Mr. RODDENBERY. None having been taken——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will state that I shall not be unmindful of the views of the gentleman from Georgia when we take up the bill.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I appreciate the great consideration the gentleman in the future will give and the views he has expressed as to that resolution, but I want to earnestly suggest to the gentleman that after the Government has spent nearly $1,000,000 in getting a report through the commission, and after a committee of the House has reported the bill, before we extend further commissions and investigations we ought to give the public some legislation on this very important question.

I am not disposed to interpose any objection to this measure, but I merely wanted to bring it to the attention of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules and let the House understand, if it is true, that the gentleman's committee would probably bring out a rule for the consideration of this immigration bill.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this public declaration on the part of the gentleman from Georgia in order that public acknowledgment may be made and his views shall not be overlooked or forgotten.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Of course, if the gentleman in any exigency should lose his equipoise and find himself in deep darkness, and should desire some enlightment, and my committee duties and other official Representative duties do not prevent and my social duties do not interfere, I should be glad to appear before the committee in perfect solemnity of heart and with all the dignity that should attach to a United States Congressman and proceed to enlighten the committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that the committee has never forgotten for a moment that the gentleman from Georgia is the very first Member for whom we should send when we get into any difficulty and need enlightenment.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I lament that the gentleman has not proceeded far enough to discover that he needed that enlightenment and information heretofore. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I observe it now. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] be permitted to address the House for one hour immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I hope that request will be granted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that on next Thursday, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] shall be permitted to address the House for one hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6176. An act for the relief of Gibbes Leykes;

S. J. Res. 119. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point John C. Scholtz, a citizen of Venezuela; and

S. J. Res. 122. Joint resolution providing for the payment of the expenses of the Senate in the impeachment trial of Robert W. Archbald.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I hope the gentleman will withhold for a moment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my point of order as to the absence of a quorum.

HOUSE BILL WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, House bill with Senate amendments of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

H. R. 20840. To provide for deficiencies in the fund for police and firemen's pensions and relief in the District of Columbia.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD an address by Dr. Hannis Taylor, former minister to Spain, on the subject of the American Commonwealth and Its Relation to the East and West. I will state that it is a very short address, but a very valuable one, on present conditions, and so forth.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an address by Dr. Hannis Taylor. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I remember the other day that the distinguished gentleman from Georgia gave notice that he would hereafter object to any request for unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of injecting political material. I rise to ask if this is a political matter?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will say to the gentleman that it is not. It is a very scholarly discussion of the subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend remarks on the bill H. R. 25741, the smokers' bill, just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I desire to print in the RECORD an address delivered by William D. Guthrie before the Pennsylvania Bar Association at its annual meeting at Cape May, June 25, 1912, on the subject of Constitutional Morality.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech by Mr. Guthrie on Constitutional Morality. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if this speech is of a political nature? The title of the speech seems to be somewhat obscure.

Mr. JAMES. Has that anything to do with the views of the Bull Moose candidate for President? [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. I will state that I have not read it through; but, so far as I have read it, it contains no politics. It does, however, make some references to criticisms which have been made of decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. MANN. The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are considered to be political on the other side of the Hall.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks on the bill H. R. 25741.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 17, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 56. An act to prohibit interference with commerce among the States and Territories and with foreign nations, and to remove obstructions thereto, and to prohibit the transmission of certain messages by telegraph, telephone, cable, or other means of communication between States and Territories and foreign nations;

H. R. 22913. An act to create a department of labor; and

H. R. 25741. An act amending section 3392 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by section 32 of the act of August 5, 1909.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 338. An act authorizing the sale of certain lands in the Colville Indian Reservation in the town of Okanogan, State of Washington, for public-park purposes;

S. 1152. An act granting an increase of pension to Mary Bradford Crowninshield;

An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange the site heretofore acquired for a United States immigration station at Baltimore, Md., for another suitable site, and to pay, if necessary, out of the appropriation heretofore made for said immigration station an additional sum in accomplishing such exchange, or to sell the present site, the money procured from such sale to revert to the appropriation made for said immigration station, and to purchase another site in lieu thereof;

H. R. 23515. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. J. Res. 220. A joint resolution to grant American citizenship to Eugene Prince.

RECLAMATION OF WET LANDS (S. DOC. NO. 877).

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a document on the subject of the reclamation of wet lands in the United States, being resolutions of the National Drainage Congress in convention at New Orleans, April 10 to 13, 1912, with an address of M. O. Leighton, Chief Hydrographer, United States Geological Survey, on the national aspect of drainage.

I ask unanimous consent that it may be published as a Senate document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEYBURN. We on this side could not hear the statement the Senator made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let the statement be read from the desk.

The SECRETARY. Resolutions of the National Drainage Congress, in convention at New Orleans, April 10 to 13, 1912——

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the paper will be printed as a Senate document.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7650) for the relief of I. S. Rogers and J. L. Worthley, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 929) thereon.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3228) to correct the military record of Job Metts, submitted an adverse report (No. 931) thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 7071) to establish an agricultural plant, shrub, fruit and ornamental tree, berry, and vegetable experimental station at or near the city of Plainview, Hale County, in the State of Texas, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12375) authorizing Daniel W. Abbott to make homestead entry, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 933) thereon.

Mr. TOWNSEND, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1154) for the relief of F. W. Theodore Schroeter, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 934) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 20873) for the relief of J. M. H. Mellon, administrator, James A. Mellon, Thomas D. Mellon, Mrs. E. L. Siverd, J. M. H. Mellon, Bessie Blue, Mrs. Simpson, Annie Turley, C. B. Eyler, Luella C. Pearce, John McCracken, A. J. Mellon, J. J. Martin, Eugene Richmond, Springdale Methodist Episcopal Church, Heidekamp Mirror Co., James P. Confer, jr., W. P. Bigley, W. J. Bole, and S. A. Moyer, all of Allegheny County, Pa., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 935) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

S. 6033. A bill for the relief of the sufferers of the Maine (Rept. No. 936); and

S. 3658. A bill for the relief of J. N. Whittaker (Rept. No. 937).

Mr. ROOT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 103) directing the Secretary of State to investigate claims of American citizens growing out of the late insurrection in Mexico, to determine the amount due, if any, and to press them for payment, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 938) thereon.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

H. R. 16191. An act to convey certain real estate in the village of Jonesville, Hillsdale County, Mich. (Rept. No. 939);

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2875) to provide for the exchange of national forest timber in New Mexico for private lands lying within the exterior limits of the Zuni National Forest, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 942) thereon.

PROTECTION OF NURSERY STOCK.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. From the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I report back favorably, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, the bill (S. 4468) to regulate the importation and interstate transportation of nursery stock; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint a Federal Horticultural Commission, and to define the powers of this commission in establishing and maintaining quarantine districts for plant diseases and insect pests; to permit and regulate the movement of fruits, plants, and vegetables therefrom, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 932) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask if it is a very long bill. It is the desire to go on with the sundry civil appropriation bill this morning.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The bill is a little long, but it is a measure of the greatest urgency. It is for the purpose of preventing the importation into this country of infested nursery stock and fruit. It is desired by the California people at this time, because they are threatened with what is known as the Mediterranean fly. That is a fruit pest which operates on fruit very much as the boll weevil operates on cotton in the South. The larvæ of the pest are in the fruit itself, and develop into a very destructive pest when they once become prevalent. Owing to the urgency of the situation, the people out there are very anxious to have something done.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a Senate bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is a Senate bill, but a favorable report has been made on a similar bill in the House of Representatives, and it is pending there now.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall not object to the consideration of this bill, but I shall object to any further unanimous consent being given for the consideration of a bill when reported this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read, if there be no objection.

The SECRETARY. The amendment of the committee is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That it shall be unlawful for any person to import or offer for entry into the United States any nursery stock unless and until a permit shall have been issued therefor by the Secretary of Agriculture, under such conditions and regulations as the said Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe, and unless such nursery stock shall be accompanied by a certificate of inspection, in manner and form as required by the Secretary of Agriculture, of the proper official of the country from which the importation is made, to the effect that the stock has been thoroughly inspected and is believed to be free from injurious plant diseases and insect pests: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall issue the permit for any particular importation of nursery stock when the conditions and regulations as prescribed in this act shall have been complied with: Provided further, That nursery stock may be imported for experimental or scientific purposes by the Department of Agriculture upon such conditions and under such regulations as the said Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe: And provided further, That nursery stock imported from countries where no official system of inspection for such stock is maintained may be admitted upon such conditions and under such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury promptly to notify the Secretary of Agriculture of the arrival of any nursery stock at port of entry; that the person receiving such stock at port of entry shall, immediately upon entry and before such stock is delivered for shipment or removed from the port of entry, advise the Secretary of Agriculture or, at his direction, the proper State, Territorial, or District official of the State or Territory or the District to which such nursery stock is destined, or both, as the Secretary of Agriculture may elect, of the name and address of the consignee, the nature and quantity of the stock it is proposed to ship, and the country and locality where the same was grown. That no person shall ship or offer for shipment from one State or Territory or District of the United States into any other State or Territory or District, any nursery stock imported into the United States without notifying the Secretary of Agriculture or, at his direction, the proper State, Territorial, or District official of the State or Territory or District to which such nursery stock is destined, or both, as the Secretary of Agriculture may elect, immediately upon the delivery of the said stock for shipment, of the name and address of the consignee, of the nature and quantity of stock it is proposed to ship, and the country and locality where the same was grown, unless and until such imported stock has been inspected by the proper official of a State, Territory, or District of the United States.

SEC. 3. That no person shall import or offer for entry into the United States any nursery stock unless the case, box, package, crate, bale, or bundle thereof shall be plainly and correctly marked to show the general nature and quantity of the contents, the country and locality where the same was grown, the name and address of the shipper, owner, or person shipping or forwarding the same, and the name and address of the consignee.

SEC. 4. That no person shall ship or deliver for shipment from one State or Territory or District of the United States into any other State or Territory or District any such imported nursery stock the case, box, package, crate, bale, or bundle whereof is not plainly marked so as to show the general nature and quantity of the contents, the name and address of the consignee, and the country and locality where such stock was grown, unless and until such imported stock has been inspected by the proper official of a State, Territory, or District of the United States.

SEC. 5. That whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine that the unrestricted importation of any plants, fruits, vegetables, roots, bulbs, seeds, or other plant products not included by the term "nursery stock" as defined in section 6 of this act may result in the entry into the United States or any of its Territories or Districts of injurious plant diseases or insect pests, he shall promulgate his determination, specifying the class of plants and plant products the importation of which shall be restricted and the country and locality where they are grown, and thereafter, and until such promulgation is withdrawn, such plants and plant products imported or offered for import into the United States or any of its Territories or Districts shall be subject to all the provisions of the foregoing sections of this act: Provided, That before the Secretary of Agriculture shall promulgate his determination that the unrestricted importation of any plants, fruits, vegetables, roots, bulbs, seeds, or other plant products not included by the term "nursery stock" as defined in section 6 of this act may result in the entry into the United States or any of its Territories or Districts of injurious plant diseases or insect pests he shall, after due notice, give a public hearing, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe, at which hearing any interested party may appear and be heard, either in person or by attorney.

SEC. 6. That for the purpose of this act the term "nursery stock" shall include all field-grown florists' stock, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, grafts, scions, buds, fruit pits and other seeds of fruit and ornamental trees or shrubs, and other plants and plant products for propagation, except field, vegetable, and flower seeds, bedding plants, and other herbaceous plants, bulbs, and roots.

SEC. 7. That whenever, in order to prevent the introduction into the United States of any tree, plant, or fruit disease or of any injurious insect, new to or not theretofore widely prevalent or distributed within and throughout the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine that it is necessary to forbid the importation into the United States of any class of nursery stock or of any other class of plants, fruits, vegetables, roots, bulbs, seeds, or other plant products from a country or locality where such disease or insect infestation exists, he shall promulgate such determination, specifying the country and locality and the class of nursery stock or other class of plants, fruits, vegetables, roots, bulbs, seeds, or other plant products which, in his opinion, should be excluded. Following the promulgation of such determination by the Secretary of Agriculture, and until the withdrawal of the said promulgation by him, the importation of the class of nursery stock or of other class of plants, fruits, vegetables, roots, bulbs, seeds, or other plant products specified in the said promulgation from the country and locality therein named, regardless of the use for which the same is intended, is hereby prohibited; and until the withdrawal of the said promulgation by the Secretary of Agriculture, and notwithstanding that such class of nursery stock, or other class of plants, fruits, vegetables, roots, bulbs, seeds, or other plant products be accompanied by a certificate of inspection from the country of importation, no person shall import or offer for entry into the United States from any country or locality specified in such promulgation any of the class of nursery stock or of other class of plants, fruits, vegetables, roots, bulbs, seeds, or other plant products named therein, regardless of the use for which the same is intended: Provided, That before the Secretary of Agriculture shall promulgate his determination that it is necessary to forbid the importation into the United States of the articles named in this section he shall, after due notice to interested parties, give a public hearing, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe, at which hearing any interested party may appear and be heard, either in person or by attorney: Provided further, That the quarantine provisions of this section, as applying to the white-pine blister rust, potato wart, and the Mediterranean fruit fly, shall become and be effective upon the passage of this act.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to quarantine any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or any portion thereof, when he shall determine the fact that a dangerous plant disease or insect infestation, new to or not theretofore widely prevalent or distributed within and throughout the United States, exists in such State or Territory or District; and the Secretary of Agriculture is directed to give notice of the establishment of such quarantine to common carriers doing business in or through such quarantined area, and shall publish in such newspapers in the quarantined area as he shall select notice of the establishment of quarantine. That no person shall ship or offer for shipment to any common carrier, nor shall any common carrier receive for transportation or transport, nor shall any person carry or transport from any quarantined State or Territory or District of the United States, or from any quarantined portion thereof, into or through any other State or Territory or District, any class of nursery stock or any other class of plants, fruits, vegetables, roots, bulbs, seeds, or other plant products specified in the notice of quarantine except as hereinafter provided. That it shall be unlawful to move or allow to be moved any class of nursery stock or any other class of plants, fruits, vegetables, roots, bulbs, seeds, or other plant products specified in the notice of quarantine hereinbefore provided, and regardless of the use for which the same is intended, from any quarantined State or Territory or District of the United States, or quarantined portion thereof, into or through any other State or Territory or District, in manner or method or under conditions other than those prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to make and promulgate rules and regulations which shall permit and govern the inspection, disinfection, certification, and method and manner of delivery and shipment of the class of nursery stock or of any other class of plants, fruits, vegetables, roots, bulbs, seeds, or other plant products specified in the notice of quarantine hereinbefore provided, and regardless of the use for which the same is intended, from a quarantined State or Territory or District of the United States, or quarantined portion thereof, into or through any other State or Territory or District; and the Secretary of Agriculture shall give notice of such rules and regulations as hereinbefore provided in this section for the notice of the establishment of quarantine: Provided, That before the Secretary of Agriculture shall promulgate his determination that it is necessary to quarantine any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or portion thereof, under the authority given in this section, he shall, after due notice to interested parties, give a public hearing, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe, at which hearing any interested party may appear and be heard, either in person or by attorney.

SEC. 9. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall make and promulgate such rules and regulations as may be necessary for carrying out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 10. That any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or of the rules or regulations herein provided for, or who shall forge, counterfeit, alter, deface, or destroy any certificate provided for in this act or in the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That no common carrier shall be deemed to have violated the provisions of any of the foregoing sections of this act on proof that such carrier did not knowingly receive for transportation or transport nursery stock or other plants or plant products as such from one State, Territory, or District of the United States into or through any other State, Territory, or District; and it shall be the duty of the United States attorneys diligently to prosecute any violations of this act which are brought to their attention by the Secretary of Agriculture or which come to their notice by other means.

SEC. 11. That the word "person" as used in this act shall be construed to import both the plural and the singular, as the case demands, and shall include corporations, companies, societies, and associations. When construing and enforcing the provisions of this act, the act, omission, or failure of any officer, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any corporation, company, society, or association, within the scope of his employment or office, shall in every case be also deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such corporation, company, society, or association as well as that of the person.

SEC. 12. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there shall be appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture from existing bureaus and offices in the Department of Agriculture, including the Bureau of Entomology, the Bureau of Plant Industry, and the Forest Service, a Federal horticultural board consisting of five members, of whom not more than two shall be appointed from any one bureau or office, and who shall serve without additional compensation.

SEC. 13. That there is hereby appropriated, out of the moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct, for the purposes and objects of this act, the sum of $25,000, which appropriation shall become immediately available.

SEC. 14. That this act shall become and be effective from and after the 1st day of October, 1912, except as herein otherwise provided.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to hear the first part of section 10 again read.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not intend to object to the bill; but I desire to ask those who are most interested in it, especially the Senator from California, if it should not be amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah has asked that the first part of section 10 be again read.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota will be recognized when that has been done.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not understand that unanimous consent has been given for the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not; and the Chair has asked whether there is objection to its present consideration?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to reserve the privilege of objecting if the bill is going to lead to debate. I do not think we have time to discuss it. I would be glad if it could be considered without debate, if it is worthy of it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to have the part of the bill indicated by me again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks for the rereading of the first part of section 10. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 10. That any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or of the rules or regulations herein provided for, or who shall forge, counterfeit, alter, deface, or destroy any certificate provided for in this act or in the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is sufficient, Mr. President. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN subsequently said: I desire to have the bill that was reported by me from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry a few moments ago referred back to the committee. We may be able to make some amendments that will meet the objections of Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

INCITEMENT OF INSURRECTION IN CUBA AND MEXICO.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I desire to report back with amendments Senate resolution 335 authorizing the Committee on Foreign Relations to investigate whether any interests in the United States have been or are now engaged in inciting rebellion in Cuba and Mexico, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the fact that the resolution authorizes an expenditure of money. Is it intended that it shall be taken from the contingent fund?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will act upon the amendments reported by the Senator from Michigan and then the resolution will necessarily go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "associations" insert the word "or." After the word "corporations" strike out "or other interests in" and insert "domiciled in or owing allegiance to," and in line 7, to strike out "and" and insert "or," and in line 15, after the word "sit," to insert "wherever necessary," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations or a subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized and directed to inquire, investigate, ascertain, and report whether any persons, associations, or corporations, domiciled in or owing allegiance to the United States have heretofore been or are now engaged in fomenting, inciting, encouraging, or financing rebellion, insurrection, or other flagrant disorder in Cuba or Mexico against the lawful, organized Governments of those countries.

Resolved further, That said committee or a subcommittee thereof is hereby empowered to summon witnesses, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to take and secure whatever testimony and evidence may be required to ascertain and report upon the matters aforesaid; and said committee or a subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized for the purposes aforesaid to sit wherever necessary and act as well when Congress is not in session as when in session.

Resolved further, That the said committee is hereby directed to report the result of its said investigation and inquiry to the Senate during the first month of the next session of Congress; and the expenses incurred by such investigation and inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. GARDNER:

A bill (S. 7317) to provide increased quarantine facilities at the port of Portland, Me.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 7318) to accept the cession by the State of Montana of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Glacier National Park, and for other purposes (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. WORKS:

A bill (S. 7319) to authorize the sale and issuance of patent for certain land to H. W. O'Melveny; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 7320) granting an increase of pension to Israel Wood (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 7321) granting an increase of pension to Luther Thompson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PERKINS:

A bill (S. 7322) for the relief of the estate of Oliver D. Greene; and

A bill (S. 7323) for the relief of Bernard G. Dingler and others, lately laborers employed by the United States military authorities under the Quartermaster's Department at San Francisco, Cal.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 7324) granting a pension to Adam Lang; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 7325) for the extension of H Street east from Eighteenth Street north to Oklahoma Avenue (with accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 7326) for the extension of Maryland Avenue east of Fifteenth Street to M Street NE.; and

A bill (S. 7327) for the extension of Eighteenth Street east from Benning Road to K Street north; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL (H. R. 25069).

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $39,000 for completing the reestablishment of the light and fog-signal station marking Thimble Shoal, Chesapeake Bay, Va., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OLIVER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $13,000 for installing mechanical stokers and otherwise improving the boiler plant at Frankford Arsenal, Philadelphia, Pa., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 56. An act to prohibit interference with commerce among the States and Territories and with foreign nations, and to remove obstructions thereto, and to prohibit the transmission of certain messages by telegraph, telephone, cable, or other means of communication between States and Territories and foreign nations, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H. R. 22913. An act to create a department of labor was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

H. R. 25741. An act amending section 3392 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by section 32 of the act of August 5, 1909, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, is it in order to move a substitute for that motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, and, on that motion, the Senator from North Carolina demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I desire to ask whether the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. WETMORE. I have a general pair with that Senator, and, in his absence, withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULBERSON (after having voted in the negative). As my pair, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] has not voted, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BAILEY. I again announce my pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON], and therefore withhold my vote. I further desire the RECORD to show that this announcement is to stand until the Senator from Montana finds it possible to return to the Senate.

Mr. LIPPITT. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HEYBURN. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I inquire if he has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that Senator has not voted.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BURNHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. As he has not voted, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. WETMORE. I have already announced my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BRADLEY. I am paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SHIVELY. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. KERN] is unavoidably absent from the city on important business. He is paired with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to announce for the day that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (after having voted in the negative). When my name was called I inadvertently voted. I am paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce the pair of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. BRIGGS (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to inquire if the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WATSON] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that Senator has not voted.

Mr. BRIGGS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia, but I will transfer that pair to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—35.

Borah	Crawford	Lippitt	Root
Bourne	Cummins	Lodge	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Dillingham	McCumber	Smoot

Clarke, Ark.	Foster	Poindexter

So Mr. WARREN's motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri will state it.

Mr. STONE. I wish to inquire whether the action of the Senate in taking up the appropriation bill at this stage will have the effect of displacing the unfinished business that would come up at 1 o'clock?

Mr. WARREN. It will not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, it does not interfere with the unfinished business, which will come up automatically at 1 o'clock under the rule.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the formal first reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the request. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMMONS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina objects.

Mr. WARREN. The Secretary, then, may proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LODGE. As the bill will be read formally now, it will not have to be read again for amendments?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would concur in that view.

Mr. BACON. We on this side could not hear the colloquy, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. We could not understand what was said.

Mr. LODGE. I said that if the bill was read formally it would not have to be read again for amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would not.

Mr. LODGE. There is no question about that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not understand that this is one of the readings required, so that it may be dispensed with or any other action may be taken in regard to it. The third reading of the bill comes after the bill goes into the Senate, and not as in Committee of the Whole. It has been read twice in the Senate, and it is entirely within the province of the Senate——

Mr. LODGE. My point was that having the bill read formally does not delay it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Not at all. I merely want the RECORD to show that we are not acting under a misconception as to the reading of the bill.

PURCHASE OF MONTICELLO.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 92, which was before the Senate yesterday morning.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator is not going about it in just the right way to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to displace the appropriation bill. He should first ask me to yield. So far as I am concerned, if the joint resolution will only take a moment or two and no debate will be involved, if I have the privilege of doing so, I will yield for the purpose of its consideration.

Mr. CUMMINS. It will take no time, I am sure.

Mr. LODGE. What is the joint resolution?

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. I intend to offer a concurrent resolution to take the place of the joint resolution, which will remove every objection that has been or could be suggested to it, I think. It is a resolution which provides for the appointment of five Senators and, if the House of Representatives concur, five Members of the House to inquire as to the wisdom and the cost of acquiring for the United States the home of Thomas Jefferson.

The only objection made yesterday morning was that the preamble seemed to commit Congress to the very purpose for which the inquiry is sought. In the concurrent resolution which I shall submit I have omitted the preamble entirely, and if it is agreed to I shall move to indefinitely postpone the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WARREN. I can not yield unless the matter can be disposed of without any extended debate, because it is only a short time until another matter will come up.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assure the Senator from Wyoming that if it leads to any considerable debate I will do just as I did yesterday morning—withdraw it, because I do not intend that it shall interfere with the progress of the appropriation bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was not here yesterday when this matter came up, but it seems to me that it will necessarily involve some discussion, for it is apparently a scheme to take the property of somebody who does not want to sell it, as I understand. I should like to know a little more about it than I know now before I enter upon the scheme.

Mr. CUMMINS. Senators sit here and see resolutions of this sort—resolutions of inquiry—pass daily. Of course, if there is objection to-day, that is the end of it for the present.

Mr. LODGE. I do not object.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, if there is objection now, I intend to press it to a conclusion at some other time.

Mr. LODGE. I do not object, but there will necessarily be some debate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, a great deal of debate if the committee was called upon to report either way, but no debate, it seems to me, based simply upon the appointment of a committee to inform the Senate and the House. There is no objection, I believe, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN. Reserving the right to object, if the concurrent resolution leads to debate, I do not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution indicated by the Senator from Iowa, which will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 92) providing for the purchase of the home of Thomas Jefferson, at Monticello, Va.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the concurrent resolution which I send to the desk.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 24), as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the Senate be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint a committee of five Members of the Senate to act in cooperation with a similar committee to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to inquire into the wisdom and ascertain the cost of acquiring Monticello, the home of Thomas Jefferson, as the property of the United States, that it may be preserved for all time in its entirety for the American people.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and read to the end of line 6, on page 4.

Mr. REED. Are there two different copies of the bill? I have been trying to follow the reading by the Clerk, but my copy does not seem to correspond with the one he has.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk has been directed to read the bill in full.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 18, page 52.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator in charge of the pending appropriation bill yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WARREN. For what purpose?

Mr. CLAPP. Some days ago unanimous consent was given, at the suggestion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], that the Indian appropriation bill might again be considered as to two items. It will take but a moment.

Mr. WARREN. It is in the nature of the completion of an appropriation bill, is it not?

Mr. CLAPP. It is to complete the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. If it will lead to no debate, Mr. President, I shall be glad to dispose of that measure in the order of business, and I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator from Minnesota will be recognized for the purpose stated by him.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLAPP. Calling attention to page 29 of the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 20728), I will state that, in line 5, the Senate struck out the committee amendment inserting the word "four" in place of the word "two" and inserted "two hundred and fifty." I ask to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amended the bill in the manner he has indicated. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 5, before the word "hundred," the Senate rejected the amendment proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to strike out "two" and to insert "four," and, after the word "hundred," the Senate inserted "and fifty," so as to read:

For continuing the construction of irrigation systems to irrigate the allotted lands of the Indians of the Flathead Reservation, in Montana, and the unallotted irrigable lands to be disposed of under authority of law, including the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, $250,000.

Mr. CLAPP. That was the action of the Senate. I move to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Now, Mr. President, I move that the amendment reported by the committee be adopted, substituting the word "four" for the word "two," in line 5, on page 29, and striking out the words "and fifty."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. On the same page, in lines 16 and 17, the Senate disagreed to the committee amendment inserting the words "and fifty." I move to reconsider the vote by which those words were stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, in line 16, after the word "hundred," an amendment was agreed to striking out the words "and fifty."

Mr. CLAPP. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. I now move that the amendment reported by the committee inserting the words "and fifty," after the word "hundred," in line 16, be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 16, after the words "one hundred," insert the words "and fifty," so as to read:

For continuing the construction of irrigation systems to irrigate the allotted lands of the Indians of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, in Montana, and the unallotted irrigable lands to be disposed of under authority of law, including the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, $150,000, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. That is all I have to offer.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, there was a committee amendment on page 6 in regard to an appropriation of $75,000 to take care of the accounting and disposition of claims of licensed traders and other bona fide claimants. It was stricken out on a point of order made by the senior Senator from Kansas. I discussed the matter with the Senator before he left the city. He is now out of town. With his consent, I intended to offer an amendment to modify it in the amount proposed to be appropriated.

My attention has just been called to the unanimous-consent agreement for the reconsideration of this bill. I supposed it had been reconsidered generally, and I intended to offer that amendment. I simply make this suggestion to put my position right with the senior Senator from Kansas, and shall not offer the amendment, because I consider that to do so would be a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CLAPP. The amendment ought to have been adopted, and were it not for the unanimous-consent agreement I would have a number of amendments of my own which I would offer.

Mr. GAMBLE. I think it is of the utmost importance, and it ought to have been agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator now desire action on the bill?

Mr. CLAPP. I move the passage of the bill as amended.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I wish to thank the Senate very sincerely for its very great courtesy in reconsidering the vote on the Indian appropriation bill in behalf of matters pertaining to Montana. I assure the Senate that its courtesy is very greatly appreciated by the Senators from Montana.

COTTON STATISTICS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I submit a conference report on House bill 19403, with an accompanying statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin presents a report, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19403) authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 2.

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
J. W. BAILEY,
S. GUGGENHEIM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. C. HOUSTON,
JOHN H. SMALL,
E. D. CRUMPACKER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin desire to have the statement printed in connection with the report?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order is made.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the Senate at the conference of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19403) authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report: The House bill provided for the collection of certain statistics monthly; the Senate amended the bill to provide for the collection of the statistics quarterly. The conferees on the part of the Senate agreed to recede from these amendments and agree to the bill in the form in which it passed the House.

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
J. W. BAILEY,
S. GUGGENHEIM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. I am not familiar with this matter. My colleague, I know, is very much interested, and so is the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and as neither of them is present, I do not know if the matter has been submitted to their judgment or not. I was simply about to suggest that we await their presence before taking final action.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am very confident, Mr. President, that the amendments which were incorporated in the bill in the Senate did not and would not have the support of the Senators named by the Senator from Georgia, and that the bill as now agreed to, striking out those amendments, would meet their approval. However, if the Senator desires——

Mr. BACON. I have every confidence in the opinion of the Senator, but unless——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The change in the bill is simply this: The bill as passed by the House provided that certain cotton statistics should be made and published monthly. The Senate amended the bill by providing instead that the statistics should be published quarterly. The House conferees objected to the amendment adopted by the Senate on the ground that it was not so favorable to the cotton growers as it would be to have the statistics printed monthly. That reasoning appealed to the conferees on the part of the Senate, and they receded and agreed to the contention of the House.

Mr. BACON. I have no doubt of the statement of the Senator that the recommendations of the conferees will be acceptable to my colleague and the Senator from South Carolina and others who are interested in the same subject, who have given it attention and consideration. I see that my colleague has just entered the Chamber, and I will ask that the matter be submitted to him. It was on the question of agreeing to the conference report which the Senator from Wisconsin has just submitted and which I suggested should be allowed to remain without action until my colleague and the Senator from South Carolina were present.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Upon what subject?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Upon the subject of cotton statistics. The Senate conferees receded from the amendments adopted in the Senate and agreed to the bill as passed by the House.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is thoroughly agreeable to me.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was very certain it would be.

Mr. BACON. Then I withdraw any objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that the conference report lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25096) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will be resumed.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, beginning at line 19, on page 52, and continued to the end of line 20, on page 73.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, at the time I moved that the Senate should proceed to the consideration of this bill I stated that it was not my intention, if I could do so without losing its place as the unfinished business, to have it interfere with appropriation bills and other privileged matters. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SIMMONS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina objects.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If any Senator desires to discuss the bill at present, of course I will yield the floor myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The consideration of the unfinished business will be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to say something in regard to this question of tolls in the Panama Canal, which was taken up the other afternoon and discussed here somewhat.

(At this point Mr. LODGE yielded for the transaction of certain routine business, which appears under its appropriate headings.)

Mr. LODGE. I yield to all morning business. No morning business seems to have been done to-day, and so I yield to all there is to do now.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that I will ask to-morrow, immediately upon the close of the routine morning business, to take up for further consideration the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I believe that appropriation bills and bills to raise revenue are of equal——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, how did I lose the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts has not lost the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator had yielded to me. He yielded to everybody else.

Mr. LODGE. I thought the Senator had taken the floor in his own right.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood that the Senator yielded to me.

Mr. LODGE. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. SIMMONS. I started to say, Mr. President, that I believe bills to appropriate public moneys and bills to raise revenue are of equal dignity under the rules of the Senate. I wish to give notice that to-morrow, immediately after the routine morning business, I shall move to take up what is known as the wool bill, and the President pro tempore having decided to recognize the Senator from Wyoming to take up the appropriation bill as against me to take up the wool bill to-day, I trust that he will extend to me the same favor of preference on to-morrow.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from North Carolina, I beg to differ with the Senator in this: It is true that under our rules, in the same paragraph, after mentioning appropriation bills, revenue bills are mentioned. Thus revenue bills are mentioned as second to appropriation bills. The Government must authorize the wherewith to conduct business, just as a moment ago it was decided that an appropriation must be provided for before a certain matter could be put in motion or seriously considered.

Therefore I shall not concede that revenue bills stand on exactly the same footing as do the appropriation bills.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, by the same token, in view of the fact that there can be no money to appropriate until there are taxes levied to collect moneys, I should think that a bill to raise revenue ought to have priority over a bill to appropriate the revenue so raised.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the regular order.

Mr. WARREN. Unfortunately, the measure the Senator has in charge is not to raise revenue, but to reduce revenue.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. SIMMONS. Unfortunately, the Senator's proposition is not a proposition to raise money.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. The Senator from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, some time ago I started to say something in regard to the question of tolls charged on vessels passing through the Panama Canal, which was under discussion here the other afternoon when I was unfortunately absent. I now renew the attempt. The question of canal tolls has arisen in connection with representations made by the Government of Great Britain in regard to our rights in fixing tolls. It so happened that I was in London when the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made, and, although the draft was sent from this country, that treaty was really made in London and should properly be called the Lansdowne-Choate treaty. I mention this merely to show that I had some familiarity with the formulation as well as the ratification of that treaty. When the treaty was submitted by the President to the Senate it so happened that I had charge of it and reported it to the Senate.

The second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as Senators will remember, embodied in substance the amendments which the Senate had made to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty. England had refused to accept those amendments and then the second treaty was made embodying in principle all for which the Senate had contended.

When I reported that treaty my own impression was that it left the United States in complete control of the tolls upon its own vessels. I did not suppose then that there was any limitation put upon our right to charge such tolls as we pleased upon our own vessels, or that we were included in the phrase "all nations." But I see very plainly, Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me before he passes from that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CUMMINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. BACON. I happened to be here at that time myself and also to be on the Foreign Relations Committee with the Senator. I want to ask the Senator if he can recall that either in the committee or in the Senate there was at any time an assertion of the opinion of Senators that that was the construction of the treaty. Does the Senator recall that that ever was asserted?

Mr. LODGE. You mean that we should have the right to determine the tolls?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I do not recall now that the question was ever raised.

Mr. BACON. I do not think it was.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On page 16, if the Senator will allow me, of pamphlet 85——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the junior Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Georgia. What pamphlet is it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is Document No. 85 of the Fifty-seventh Congress. This was a motion offered apparently in the Senate in connection with the treaty of December 13, 1900, which, after being amended by the Senate, I understand was not approved by Great Britain. On page 16 it seems that this amendment was offered:

> The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.

I find that the Senate even rejected this, voting yeas 27, nays 43. I wanted to ask the Senator——

Mr. LODGE. That refers to the first treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BACON. That I had in mind, of course. If I recollect aright it was Senator Bard's amendment. I will not stop to explain it now, but my vote in favor of it was not on the ground that I favored free ships. But in view of the Senator's statement that he reported the bill, which was a fact, and indicating his familiarity with it, I wanted to ask him what his then construction of it was, whether he could recall that in the process of the making of that treaty, either while it was in committee or in the Senate, it was ever asserted by anyone as the proper construction of that treaty.

Mr. LODGE. I do not remember that any construction either one way or the other was asserted.

Mr. BACON. I do not either. I quite agree with the Senator in that regard, and it was for that reason that I asked the question.

Mr. LODGE. I mentioned merely my own impression, which was that it left the fixing of tolls to us, but it is very clear to anyone on the simple reading of the clause that the interpretation is open to doubt. I think on the face of the words either view can fairly be taken. Such being the case, Mr. President, I do not wish anything done by which this Government could ever be exposed to the suggestion even of not acting in good faith under a treaty. I think we should be most punctilious, even if there is nothing more than a doubt about a word, in carrying out the treaty strictly to its letter.

It is, of course, also true, as the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] pointed out, that if we should undertake simply to make our ships free, we should raise a question which would then, under our treaties of arbitration, necessarily go to The Hague.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Is the Senator addressing himself now to the treatment of our vessels engaged in foreign commerce, or do his remarks apply, and are they intended to apply, to the coastwise trade?

Mr. LODGE. I mean all American vessels. For the purposes of this treaty, it does not make any difference what trade they are engaged in.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Whether in the coastwise or the foreign trade?

Mr. LODGE. Not the slightest, I think.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I call the Senator's attention——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to say, Mr. President, that in calling the Senator's attention to this matter I do it because I really want the benefit of his discussion and his opinion. I find in One hundred and ninety-fifth United States, page 332, in the case of Olsen v. Smith, the Supreme Court of the United States seemed to recognize an entire difference between our coastwise vessels and vessels engaged in foreign business, and they held that even under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to give special privileges to a coastwise vessel was not violative of our agreements with Great Britain, as the coastwise trade was limited to American vessels, and for that reason a concession to them could not violate the right of any English vessel. It would seem that if that opinion is sound we would have no embarrassment about extending special privileges to coastwise vessels, and that they would occupy a position entirely different from our vessels engaged in foreign trade. I only wanted to call the Senator's attention to that opinion.

Mr. LODGE. I am very glad the Senator has done so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will permit me, I will say just one word more. I do not wish to discuss this subject at all elaborately, and I will detain him only a moment.

This last treaty especially emphasizes the preservation of our neutrality agreement with England under article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and asserts in substance that it is not intended to interfere with the general principles therein enunciated. In article 8 it is stated that the canal shall be open to citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms——

Mr. LODGE. Where does the existing treaty refer to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty?

Mr. ROOT. In the preamble.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, in the preamble. Yes; I remember that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In the preamble.

Mr. LODGE. But, Mr. President, in my opinion, for the purposes of this treaty, there is no distinction to be drawn between American vessels engaged in coastwise traffic and American vessels engaged in foreign trade. There is no such distinction in the treaty. It says "the vessels of all nations."

Of course, the decision in the United States Supreme Court does not bind Great Britain and would not prevent this question from going to The Hague. Under our treaties of arbitration, in my judgment, nothing could prevent this question from going to The Hague, if we live up to the existing treaties of arbitration which we have with 26 other powers. If it goes to The Hague, I think we may take it as decided now. It is not likely that the United States would ever get a favorable decision from that tribunal on a question where the interests of Europe are on one side and those of the United States on the other. But, Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it not very clear——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it not almost beyond doubt that the United States would lose?

Mr. LODGE. Unquestionably. Therefore, Mr. President, in the first place, I desire to observe the treaty. If there is any doubt about it, I desire to observe it in the most punctilious manner. In the second place, if we put in free ships we are simply running ourselves into a prejudged award, which may take the form of refunding all other payments made by other nations or compel large payments by ourselves.

But the English note, as I understand it, which was submitted to us, goes a step further. It undertakes to suggest that we can not, if we choose, pay the tolls of our own vessels, because if we pay the tolls of the American vessels it amounts to giving them free passage. Of course, paying the tolls would cost the United States nothing, no more than if the passage was made free; it amounts to giving them free passage through the canal.

This proposition I regard, Mr. President, as a totally different thing from the question of the right of giving free passage to our own vessels, and I for one will never admit that any foreign power has the right to say what we shall give to our shipping or our railroads or anything or anybody we please, if we choose to give it. That is a domestic question for us and for nobody else to settle. If we saw fit in that way to give American vessels the benefit of the canal which we have built and paid for, we have a clear right to do it, and we violate no treaty injunction by doing it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask the Senator if that does not violate the maxim that you can not do indirectly what you are prohibited from doing directly?

Mr. LODGE. Because, Mr. President, the proposition is that all ships shall pay the same tolls. Now, if the American ships pay the same tolls, nobody can go behind that and ask where the money came from.

Let me call attention to certain facts in that connection.

Through the Suez Canal pass, of course, the vessels of the Peninsular & Oriental Steamship Co., a great British company, which carries on a vast traffic with India and the East. The canal tolls paid by this great British line in 1907 aggregated £333,000. The subsidies aggregated £332,784.

For 1910 the tolls were £357,000 and the subsidies £297,000.

The North German Lloyd, which passes through the Suez Canal, was paid a Government subsidy of $1,385,000, which substantially paid all the Suez Canal tolls of the great German Fleet passing back and forth through that canal.

The French subsidies to the three French lines amounted to $1,145,000. "In some instances"—I am quoting now from the report of the Commissioner of Navigation—"the nations make direct appropriations for the payment of the tolls by their vessels in the Suez Canal." For instance, "the Russian budget in 1909 carried an item of 650,000 rubles ($334,750) to pay the tolls of the merchant steamships of the Russian Volunteer Fleet."

Austria pays all the tolls of her vessels passing through the Suez Canal, and other countries—Sweden and Japan among them—pay a large proportion of the tolls of their vessels.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Were these tolls paid in express terms as tolls?

Mr. LODGE. They were paid in the case of Austria and Russia in express terms as tolls. The appropriations were made for tolls. I merely want to show what is done in the case of the Suez Canal.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. It was stated here the other day with reference to England, at least, that these payments were in the nature of rebates, as subsidies for carrying the mail, I think. When the Senator says it is an appropriation for tolls, is he advised as to whether there is any consideration for the tolls moving the Government to the appropriation of the tolls, or is it a direct effort to simply relieve the ships of the burden of the tolls?

Mr. LODGE. It is an appropriation to relieve the ships. If the Senator desires, as it is all here in the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, I will read it. It is done specifically.

In some instances the appropriation is made in terms to pay the Suez tolls, as the Russian budget in 1909 carried an item of 650,000 rubles ($334,750) to pay the tolls of the merchant steamships of the Russian Volunteer Fleet. In 1909 the tonnage of that company was 130,200 net tons, so the Government grant was equal to $2.57 per net ton. At that time the Suez Canal dues were at the following rates: Seven francs seventy-five centimes ($1.50) per net ton on ships with cargo and 5 francs 25 centimes ($1.01) on ships in ballast. At the same time a charge of 10 francs ($1.93) was made on adult passengers, while children between 3 and 12 years old were charged at half rates, and no charge was imposed on children under 3 years. The Russian Government, accordingly, provided for the payment of canal charges not only on the tonnage of the ship, but also on the men, women, and children carried on board.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; but does the report in this case disclose the purpose?

Mr. LODGE. It discloses that appropriations are made for tolls. They are made exactly and in precise words for tolls; they are adjusted so as to pay them precisely, not only on the tonnage, but on the passenger.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; that is true; but does it exclude any other idea? Is the information before the Senate——

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely excluding any other idea.

Mr. CLAPP. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. LODGE. There are no services whatever rendered by the ships to their governments in return.

Mr. REED and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I noticed the language the Senator from Massachusetts read contained the words "the Russian volunteer fleet." Does the Senator understand that that is some fleet which is attached to the war vessels of the Russian Government and subject to be called upon?

Mr. LODGE. The Russian Government may have some right of calling on them in time of war, as we have of calling on the American steamship line.

Mr. REED. The inquiry was brought about by the thought that possibly there might be some circumstance of that kind which would enable the Russian Government to claim that this was a special benefit paid for by them in consideration of the service of this fleet, or its liability to service, in time of war; and I thought perhaps the Senator could enlighten me upon that point.

Mr. LODGE. I think not, Mr. President; I think it is specific. It is as clearly stated as possible. The Commissioner of Navigation says, to begin with:

About 25 per cent of the Suez Canal tolls on foreign merchant vessels are now paid in one form or another from the treasuries of the nations whose flags those vessels fly, respectively.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. STONE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield, and to whom?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Massachusetts will not claim, will he, nor does the Commissioner of Navigation claim, that any part of such mail subsidies or bounties as may be appropriated or paid by the British Government, is for the specific purpose of reimbursing their vessels for the tolls paid for passing through the Suez Canal?

Mr. LODGE. I did not say it was. I said that, as a matter of fact, they did it, but I did not say they did it specifically for that purpose.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Massachusetts has stated that the Russian Government, for example—and I think he possibly named one or two others—paid tolls out of the treasury of the nation exacted on vessels of Russian register passing through the Suez Canal. The inquiry I make is to this effect: Whether the Senator can tell the Senate if the tolls paid in the first instance, presumably by the owners of the vessels passing through the Suez Canal, are covered into the Russian treasury, and whether, if that be true, the Government of Russia merely refunds that money to such vessels?

Mr. LODGE. The Russian Government does not own the Suez Canal. Those are for outright payments. I do not think Russia is even a stockholder.

Mr. STONE. It has no interest whatever in it.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think it has. I can not tell accurately. The principal stockholder is Great Britain, of course.

Mr. STONE. I am aware of that fact.

Mr. LODGE. And I think the remainder of the stock is distributed very widely among smaller stockholders.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I merely wish to state that my recollection is that, either in the same report from which the Senator has read or in a later report, the Commissioner of Navigation states that the Spanish Government is now preparing to take care of the tolls that steamship lines being established to go through the Panama Canal will be required to pay.

Mr. LODGE. That must be in a later report. I do not think it is here. I am obliged to the Senator for the suggestion.

Mr. JONES. I know there is a suggestion of that kind in one of the reports of the Commissioner of Navigation.

Mr. LODGE. Now, let me call attention to some details in order to show that there is no misapprehension about it—that it is not attempted to do it under another form. Take Austria. Austria provides an annual subsidy of 4,700,000 crowns for the Austrian Lloyd Steamship Co., but it contains another article, which is given here in German, which says that the company is also to receive for the passage of the Suez Canal on lines 9, 10, and 11, an amount equal to the tolls paid. The Commissioner of Navigation says:

Of course this means that the Austrian treasury, besides the subsidies, will pay annually the tolls on the following Austrian merchant voyages through the Suez Canal.

* * * * * * *

In the case of Sweden, the Swedish royal foreign office on May 26, 1908, advised the American minister at Stockholm:

"The maritime navigation company (Svenska Ostasiatiska Kompaniet) receives from the State, for the years 1907–1911, a subvention of 1,850,000 crowns to insure a regular service between Sweden and the ports of the extreme Orient. This subvention has been calculated in a manner to represent the amount of the tolls paid by the ships of the company for passing the Suez Canal."

Mr. President, I do not bring out these facts for the purpose of advocating subsidies or anything of that character; I bring them out to show that in the Suez Canal, where there is precisely the same provision, beginning in the concession to De Lesseps in 1854, for equality of tolls among all nations, it has never been considered for a moment a breach of that agreement for any nation to pay the tolls of its own vessels going through the canal, if it sees fit to do so.

How could it be otherwise? The Austrian-Lloyd steamships go through the Suez Canal and pay the tolls. Is Great Britain to stand up and say, "We can not permit those tolls to be paid by the Austrian Government; those vessels are having an undue privilege"? Austria would say to England or to any other power which for one moment attempted to do that, "What we give our vessels or what arrangements we make with our steamship companies or with any domestic institution is our affair. If the money is received for the toll, you have no right to go behind it and ask where the money came from."

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If we concede that it would be a violation of the treaty for Austria or the United States or any other government to make provision by which its vessels engaged in a local business within its own territory could go through such canal free, does it not follow that a provision of that kind in a treaty, recognized everywhere as the highest form of law and the most sacred form of obligation, could not be overridden by some municipal regulation, call it domestic, if you please, but which, in effect, rendered nugatory the provision of the treaty?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I confess it is difficult for me to comprehend that such an attitude should be taken. We will assume, for the purposes of argument, that we have agreed that the same tolls shall be charged to vessels of the United States as to all other vessels. When vessels of other countries begin to go through the canal and we learn that Austria appropriates money for the tolls for her vessels, have we a right to turn around to Austria and say, "You must not do that; it is an evasion of the terms of the treaty, because you are paying the tolls of your vessels"? Those are not the terms of the treaty. The terms of the treaty are that the tolls collected from all vessels shall be the same.

Mr. NELSON and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that the subsidies, to which the Senator has referred as being granted by foreign nations, relate only to particular lines that are carrying the mails or to cases where it is sought to establish a line between different points, while the larger share of the commerce is carried on in what are called "tramp" vessels, which are never subsidized.

I want to call the Senator's attention further to the fact, that in our coastwise trade American ships have an absolute monopoly. I can not travel from one port to another on the Atlantic coast or anywhere else in this country except in an American ship. If I travel in any other, I or the ship would have to pay a fine of $200. They have a complete monopoly of the whole trade. They not only have a monopoly of the merchandise they carry from port to port, which is all right enough; but, if I am stranded in one of the coast towns on the Atlantic coast, and want to go to another port along the coast, if no American ship is available and I happen to take a foreign ship which chances to be at hand, there is a fine of $200 imposed on the ship; and, of course, the ship will not stand it, but the man who has to travel in that way will have to pay the fine. In view of all those privileges, to give all these vessels the free privilege of the Panama Canal, built by the funds of the American people, seems to me utterly unfair and unjust. We are simply adding another burden, another bonus, another privilege to American shipping. The only statutory monopoly we have in this country is the coastwise trade; and this proposition is to add to the power of that monopoly, and nothing else.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator entirely misapprehends the point I am endeavoring to make. I am not arguing in favor of advantages to the American coastwise traffic or even to the few American vessels engaged in foreign business, which have no protection whatever. The point I am trying to make is, that I do not think any foreign government has the right to come in here and dictate to us whether we shall or shall not, if we so choose, pay the tolls on American vessels. They have the right to protest if we make our vessels free; but when they go beyond that and try to say what we shall do in the matter of domestic legislation, I, for one, would like to enter my protest against it.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. FALL. Merely to make a suggestion to the Senator from Massachusetts. Suppose you should read into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty with reference to tolls the following language:

The tolls or dues shall be collected, without any exceptional favor, from all vessels in like circumstances.

Then, would the Senator entertain the same objection which he is now discussing with reference to our right to evade, if not to violate, the treaty?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course if the language of the treaty were other than it is we should have a different interpretation. I am dealing with the language of the treaty as it is.

Mr. FALL. I am dealing with the proposition of law that, in construing a statute which is ambiguous, you can consider other statutes in connection with it upon the same subject.

Mr. President, there is something more than merely the strict wording of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, it seems to me, to be considered here. For instance, there is the Panama treaty, under which we have constructed the Panama Canal; and back of that Panama treaty the ratification and sale by Panama to the United States Government for $40,000,000 of the concession under which the French undertook to construct the canal, which concession was ratified by Panama in its grant to the United States of the right to build the canal.

If the Senator will permit me, if he will examine article 8 of the treaty of the United States with Panama, of 1903, he will find that by that article—

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all rights which it now has or hereafter may acquire to the property of the New Panama Canal Co. and the Panama Railroad Co. as a result of the transfer of sovereignty from the Republic of Colombia to the Republic of Panama over the Isthmus of Panama and authorizes the New Panama Canal Co. to sell and transfer to the United States its rights, privileges, properties, and concessions—

That is, the rights, privileges, properties, and concessions of the New Panama Canal Co.—

as well as the Panama Railroad and all the shares or part of the shares of that company.

And public lands, which were not necessary to the construction of the canal which had been granted by Colombia by the concession referred to and here ratified, were to be the property of the Republic of Panama.

In that same treaty not only is the transfer and the original concession, constituting the basis of our title to this property, ratified by terms, but also the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is referred to and ratified.

In the original concession, for which we paid $40,000,000 and which is the basis of our title—and I might mention incidentally, because of the failure of Colombia to ratify a treaty which would give the United States the power to acquire that canal property, which it did not have under the concession itself—because of that failure it is understood that the rebellion in Panama ensued, and Panama did what Colombia refused to do—allow this concession to be transferred to a foreign Government.

Under the original concession, article 14 of the concession for the building of the Panama Canal provides distinctly as to the tolls to be collected:

That they shall collect these dues, without any exceptional favor, from all vessels in like circumstances.

We bought this and paid for it, and then took a deed from Panama ratifying this concession in these words, and also ratifying the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It seems to me that, considering them altogether, there is no question about not only the lack of right in the United States to adopt these tolls but that it would be an evasion of the strict terms, which should be read into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, for us to do by indirection what we can not do directly.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was on the committee which had charge of the Panama treaty to which the Senator refers, and gave some attention to it at the time. So I am not unfamiliar with its provisions. It does not seem to me to alter the case. The point I am making is not whether I think or do not think we ought to make the canal free; it is not whether, on the merits of the case, we should remit the tolls or give American ships money to pay the tolls; that is a question to be decided on its merits. My proposition is simply this: That I deny wholly the right of any outside power to come here and tell us what arrangements we shall make with our own shipping. They may protest against exemption from all tolls; I grant that, although the clause in the treaty is doubtful; and that they may fairly take us before The Hague court; but if we are to admit that a foreign Government can say to us what arrangements we shall make with our own shipping, it seems to me there is absolutely no limit to the domestic questions which may be carried before The Hague court for decision, and no limit to the power foreign Governments may exercise over us.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me there?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. If there were a reference to The Hague, it would not be as to what we would be permitted to do in the regulation of our own shipping or in the exaction of tolls from it, but it would be a question as to what would be the resulting right to other nations if we did certain things in favor of our own shipping. That, I think, would be the question.

Mr. LODGE. Exactly.

Mr. BACON. And not the question as to whether we had a right to make any particular provision as to our own shipping. The question would be the consequential right which flows to them.

Mr. LODGE. Out of this, of course, grows the inevitable inference that if foreign nations can prevent our paying the tolls of our vessels, if we see fit to pay them, what is there to prevent us saying to them when we fix the tolls, "You have no right to pay the tolls of your vessels going through the canal. That is not putting them on an equality; that is an exceptional favor that you would grant to this Austrian line or this Russian line or this English line." Suppose we should say to Great Britain, if they were to send great ships through the Panama Canal such as ply between Liverpool and New York, "You made a free gift of the Mauretania and the Lusitania to the Cunard Co.; you made them a loan of £4,000,000 to build those ships, and then you gave them a subsidy that pays the interest on it"; and suppose we should undertake to say, "You must not do that; we can not have vessels going through the canal under those conditions"; why, Mr. President, no nation would tolerate such treatment for a moment. Our power to fix the tolls does not give us the power to go behind and inquire who is paying the tolls. Of course it does not; and I say if we have not the power to go behind the actual payment and cross-question Austria and England and the other powers as to how the tolls on their ships are paid, they have not the right to come in here and ask who is paying the tolls on our ships. That is what I resent.

I am not prepared to say it is a good thing for us to make the canal free to our ships or that they should not pay tolls. I had hoped the canal might be of some benefit to our shipping; but I have come pretty well to the conclusion that it is not the intention of this Government ever to help American shipping; in fact, it is now apparently expected that we should throw the coastwise shipping open to all the world. No other nation admits everybody in their coastwise trade; but, however that may be, I do protest against the doctrine that what we do to our shipping in regard to tolls or anything else is a matter for a foreign government to regulate.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. PERCY. I understood the Senator made the statement that no other country throws open its coastwise trade to foreign countries. Is he not mistaken about that in regard to England? Is not the coastwise trade of England thrown open to vessels of the world?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think so; I think they have restrictions in favor of English vessels.

Mr. PERCY. That is my impression in regard to it.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly there are coastwise restrictions in the case of every other country except England, and England restricts by light dues and port dues and rules of Lloyds, which amount to the same thing.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator mean, in the case of England, the coastwise trade between England and the various parts of the empire?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; I simply mean the coastwise trade of Great Britain and Ireland.

Mr. BACON. That is a very small matter in point of territory.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, that coastwise trade of Great Britain and Ireland is very large, indeed.

Mr. BACON. I say in point of territory it is very restricted.

Mr. LODGE. In that respect; yes.

Mr. BACON. Of course, if you include the whole British Empire, that would be very vast.

Mr. LODGE. I did not mean to include the colonies of England in her coastwise trade.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. REED. If it be true, as maintained by some, that if this Government were to pay subsidies to our ships passing through the canal equal to the tolls collected and that foreign governments could object to that as a discrimination, or, rather, as a violation of the terms of this treaty, would it not follow for this reason that this Government would then be in a more unfortunate condition with reference to the canal it built than any other nation? Other nations do pay subsidies to their ships, and would it not permit the other nations to pay subsidies to their ships and deny us the right they would exercise?

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely. I agree with that statement.

Mr. REED. I say that because I am inclined to concur with the Senator in his analysis of this legal question, although I am very far from being convinced that we ought to pay any subsidy.

Mr. LODGE. That is another question.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. It is not a question which I am attempting to discuss now. But I wanted to draw the distinction between the question of making our ships free through the canal, which I believe is open to question under the treaty and therefore should not be attempted, and the right of this Government, if it chooses, to grant to its ships the amount of the tolls. As to the second question, I can not see that any foreign government has the right to enter into it at all. It is for us to determine, and if we determine it is not wise to do it, very well; but if we determine that it is wise to do it, I hold it is nobody's business but our own.

Mr. REED. The Senator will pardon me a further word. It seems to me a good deal would depend upon the form in which it was done. If in a bill fixing tolls we were to provide that in the event of American vessels going through the canal there should be remitted to them the amount of the tolls, it would present one question; but if we were to provide what tolls should be charged and then if we were to provide in a separate bill that there should be paid to all American vessels carrying freight going through the canal certain sums, and if those sums happened to be the same as the tolls, it seems to me it would be very difficult for any foreign government to raise the question.

But if in the same bill, manifestly for the purpose of remitting the tolls, we were to provide for an absolute remission, it seems to me it would be a different question. I do not know whether I make myself plain.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I think a great deal depends upon the form in which it is put, and in my humble capacity I state it without committing myself to that doctrine.

Mr. LODGE. I think the question lies as the Senator stated it before; that to attempt otherwise would be to admit that they had a control over the canal that we did not exercise.

Now, of course, this grows out of a very simple thing. This whole excitement has arisen out of the fact that there is one country, and only one country, in the world which is situated in regard to the canal just as we are, and that is Canada. England is not worrying over her own merchant marine. Her great merchant marine is not going to be affected by whether our ships go through free or whether they pay tolls. The trouble is the Canadian voyage. If our ships should have an advantage the Canadian business would probably come in American vessels to American ports, and then by American railroads in bond back to Canada. The Canadians do not like that, and they would rather not pay a subsidy to equalize it, if that should happen. That is the cause of all this.

I am not finding any fault with them. I do not find fault that they should look after their own. I wish we did it a little better.

But I desired to make protest against this attempt to go beyond the question of our right to fix tolls equal for ourselves as well as for everybody else, which is a question that concerns others, and our right to pay tolls for our own vessels, which is a domestic question and does not concern anybody but ourselves, and in that I wish to protest against any foreign interference.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I did not quite clearly understand the Senator. When he speaks of our own vessels, does he refer only to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade?

Mr. LODGE. I refer to all American vessels, no matter what they are engaged in. They are all alike.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does he refer to vessels engaged in the international trade in competition with others?

Mr. LODGE. All American bottoms. The American coastwise trade is well taken care of now.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator think that the United States has any greater right to grant free passage to vessels in our coastwise trade than it has to American vessels in the international trade?

Mr. LODGE. Before the Senator came in I stated that I did not see any distinction that could be drawn.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the Senator from Massachusetts takes his seat I should like to ascertain if I understand him correctly as holding the proposition that no nation can interfere with the internal arrangements of another nation with reference to its own shipping, and whether he concedes that under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty Great Britain could remit to British ships the amount of the tolls that would be collected under the proposed treaty?

Mr. LODGE. Unquestionably. Great Britain can pay the tolls on every ton of British or Canadian tonnage that goes through our canal.

Mr. McCUMBER. Directly?

Mr. LODGE. I mean that the tolls, of course, would have to be paid into the treasury of the canal.

Mr. McCUMBER. But remitted?

Mr. LODGE. Remitted.

Mr. McCUMBER. If that is true, then any party to this contract can evade its purpose.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to draw the distinction——

Mr. LODGE. One moment. I do not think so. Our promise is of equal tolls. We do not promise as to who shall pay those tolls or where they shall come from, or whether one nation shall help its shipping and another not. We simply say the tolls shall all be equal.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to call attention to the fact that while we obligated ourselves in the treaty to charge equal tolls to all countries, neither Great Britain nor any other country is under any obligation of that sort, and would not, therefore, be bound to any such obligation. How can the Senator——

Mr. LODGE. Great Britain has nothing to do with the tolls we charge.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No. Yet the Senator stated that in his opinion Great Britain could pay the tolls on her vessels through the canal and therefore we could pay the tolls on our vessels.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, as a matter of fact that is not true, because Great Britain has entered into no obligation not to do so, whereas we have entered, as is claimed by Great Britain, into such an obligation.

Mr. LODGE. That is exactly what I deny. I deny that we agreed not to pay the tolls on our vessels if we saw fit.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator may deny that, but we have agreed not to charge any other tolls to foreign vessels than we do to our own.

Mr. LODGE. Then we come precisely to the position stated by the Senator from Missouri a few moments ago, that we have a more contracted right in our own canal than any other nation on earth.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But the Senator realizes that the consideration which Great Britain gave for the new treaty was the abandonment of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. That is the only consideration she gave. She gave no promise as to what she would do with her own shipping or what she would do with the Panama Canal tolls.

Mr. LODGE. Nobody did.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We, however, in order to get rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, did make a stipulation as to tolls, and Great Britain claims that, on her interpretation of that promise, we can not discriminate. It does not seem to me that we are in the same position that a foreign country is——

Mr. LODGE. I do not think we do discriminate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Because we have made a promise, and the other has made none.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think they are bound, and I do not think we are bound.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But the Senator must see there is a difference, a distinction. We have made a promise, and they have made none.

Mr. LODGE. We have made a promise that all tolls shall be equal to all nations; that is all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But Great Britain has made no such promise.

Mr. LODGE. That is all we promised.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My point is that Great Britain is not bound as we are bound. On any theory——

Mr. LODGE. Great Britain, of course, has not made a promise, because the canal is not hers.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; and probably it is not in point to say that Great Britain might refund the money——

Mr. LODGE. What I say is that we do not violate that promise if we pay our own tolls.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator will perceive that is a question which will have to be settled at The Hague.

Mr. LODGE. I do not agree to that at all. It is a domestic question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator deny——

Mr. LODGE. If we were to declare that no American vessels should pay any tolls, then I grant you it would be a question as to the interpretation of the treaty to go to The Hague. I do not think the other is. I think the other is a domestic question, not within the purview of the treaty at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But suppose, instead of saying that American vessels should pay no tolls, we pay them; that we shall say American vessels shall pay the same tolls as vessels of other countries, and then we will refund the money. Would we not be doing indirectly exactly what we have agreed not to do directly?

Mr. LODGE. Of course we should be subsidizing our vessels to that extent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Would we not be refunding the very money that we had collected?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And, certainly, we would be doing indirectly what we have agreed not to do directly.

Mr. LODGE. Of course we should be doing it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not see that the Senators are making any headway.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the committee has reported to this body a bill which relieves coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls. The question first to be decided, therefore, is whether or not under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the agreement we made with Panama we have any moral or legal right to so discriminate. That is to be determined before we begin to consider the proposition of whether or not we can in some way evade it.

If the subject of the Panama Canal had no history whatever, Mr. President, prior to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—if that instrument were the first declaration with reference to the American policy of an Atlantic and Pacific canal—I could not understand how anyone could construe paragraph 1 of article 3 in any way that would not include the United States in its provisions:

This paragraph reads:

> 1. The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise.

The phrase "of all nations on terms of entire equality" can not on any logical theory be construed to mean all nations but the United States.

If it is difficult for me to comprehend how any such strange construction could be placed upon the instrument itself, without a history, that difficulty becomes insurmountable when we take into consideration the declared policy of this Government during the long years of diplomatic correspondence, the many treaties, the consistent declarations of this Government through its executive and its legislative departments, the debates in Congress on the very subject of whether the word "all" included this Government, the effort to so amend that treaty so that the United States would be at liberty to discriminate in favor of its coastwise trade—when we consider all of these there is left no room for the slightest doubt, not only of the understanding of this country but of the understanding of the entire world, as to the proper construction of this paragraph.

DECLARED POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES.

I purpose to go back into the history of the events leading up to the adoption of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty with a view of presenting to the Senate the historical American attitude with reference to any canal that might be constructed by any State or any people connecting the oceans at the Isthmus of Darien. I will not, however, take up the time of the Senate in the details of the incidental questions—the colonizations of the new world which made the subject of an isthmian canal a living question, or any of the subordinate questions which incidentally involved the discussion of that subject.

As early as March 3, 1835, a resolution passed the Senate in the following words:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the Governments of other nations, and particularly with the Governments of Central American and New Granada, for the purpose of effectually protecting, by suitable treaty stipulations with them, such individuals or companies as may undertake to open a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and of securing forever, by such stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations, on the payment of such reasonable tolls as may be established to compensate the capitalists who may engage in such undertaking and complete the work.

This is one of our early declarations that any canal that might be established should be established on terms of absolute equality to all vessels of the world.

This keynote, "the free and equal right to all nations," is a phrase that has been reiterated again and again in all our diplomatic correspondence concerning an isthmian canal.

Following this and on the 12th day of December, 1846, a treaty of amity, navigation, and commerce was drawn up and signed by the representatives of the United States and New Granada, now Colombia. The thirty-fifth article of this agreement provides:

And this equality of favors (relating to the equal treatment of American commerce with that of Granadan commerce) shall be made to extend to the passengers, correspondence, and merchandise of the United States in their transit across the said territory from one sea to the other. The Government of New Granada guarantees to the Government of the United States that the right of way or transit across the Isthmus of Panama upon any modes of communication that now exist, or that may be hereafter constructed, shall be open and free to the Government and citizens of the United States, and for the transportation of any articles of product, manufacture, or merchandise of lawful commerce belonging to the citizens of the United States; that no other tolls or charges shall be levied or collected upon the citizens of the United States, or their said merchandise thus passing over any road or canal that may be made by the Government of New Granada, or by the authority of the same, than is under like circumstances levied upon and collected from the Granadan citizens.

I want to call attention to the words of President Polk in presenting this treaty. In his reference to it in his message to Congress he says:

In entering into the mutual guaranties proposed by the thirty-fifth article of the treaty, neither the Government of New Granada nor that of the United States has any narrow or exclusive views. The ultimate object, as presented by the Senate of the United States in their resolution to which I have already referred, is to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the isthmus. If the United States, as the chief of the American nations, should first become a party to this guaranty, it can not be doubted—indeed, it is confidently expected by the Government of New Granada—that similar guaranties will be given to that Republic by Great Britain and France. Should the proposition thus tendered be rejected, we may deprive the United States of the just influence which its acceptance might secure to them, and confer the glory and benefits of being first among the nations in concluding such an arrangement upon the Government either of Great Britain or France. That either of these Governments would embrace the offer can not well be doubted, because there does not appear to be any other effectual means of securing to all nations the advantages of this important passage but the guaranty of great commercial powers that the isthmus shall be neutral territory. The interests of the world at stake are so important that the security of this passage between the two oceans can not be suffered to depend upon the wars and revolutions which may arise among different nations.

In a letter written to the Secretary of State, Mr. Clayton, on September 25, 1849, by our minister to France, he quotes an interview he had with Lord Palmerston. In the discussion of this question, in which he undoubtedly acted under the authority of his Government and represented its views, he stated:

That the United States sought no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind in regard to the proposed communication, and their sincere wish, if it should be found practicable, was to see it dedicated to the common use of all nations on the most liberal terms and a footing of perfect equality for all

That is the ancient declaration of this country, and it is a declaration that has followed our policy all the way through down to and including the adoption of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Again, he says:

That the United States would not, if they could, obtain any exclusive right or privilege in a great highway which naturally belonged to all mankind.

That while they aimed at no exclusive privilege for themselves, they could never consent to see so important a communication fall under the exclusive control of any other commercial power.

Following this, in 1849, the Secretary of State, Mr. Clayton, in a letter to Mr. Lawrence, again defines the attitude of the United States toward Great Britain on the subject of the canal. In this letter our Secretary of State approaches Great Britain for the purpose of securing a canal through Nicaragua under the joint protection of both Governments.

He says:

If, however, the British Government shall reject these overtures on our part, and shall refuse to cooperate with us in the generous and philanthropic scheme of rendering the interoceanic communication by way of the port and river of San Juan free to all nations upon the same terms, we shall deem ourselves justified in protecting our interests independently of her aid and despite her opposition or hostility.

The Secretary then cited a treaty which had been obtained for this Government by Mr. Heis from the Nicaraguan Government, using that as a club to compel Great Britain to enter into the agreement which she afterwards entered into in the Clayton-Bulwer instrument.

Senator Davis, in commenting upon this incident, states as follows—and certainly we never have had a Senator who was a more thorough scholar or historian than Senator Davis:

This paper was submitted to the British Government. It was an explicit and peremptory demand for an agreement that would give to Nicaragua the freedom of exit to the sea through the San Juan River for a ship canal that should be open to all nations on equal terms and protected by an agreement of perfect neutrality.

In the origin of our claim to the right of way for our people and our products, armies, mails, and other property through a canal which our citizens had contracted with Nicaragua to build, we offered to make it neutral ground, and denied to our Government the exclusive right to use and control it.

We went further and, with a treaty in our hands in which Nicaragua had granted us exclusive rights and powers for building and owning a canal, we refused to ratify it, but laid it before Great Britain as an argument to induce that Government to withdraw her protectorate over the Mosquito Indians, who then claimed to hold the mouth of the San Juan de Nicaragua in lawful and independent sovereignty under the protection of Great Britain.

So, Mr. President, we were not only the moving spirit in securing the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, establishing therein a declaration of neutrality and the free use of any ship canal, but previous to that time we had declared that we would enter into no agreement, nor would we adopt any policy, that would give us independently or in connection with any other country an exclusive control of a canal.

Following this, again, in 1857 Lord Napier suggested the plan of a joint protectorate of any transoceanic canal through the Isthmus of Darien by Great Britain, France, and the United States. Mr. Cass, replying to that suggestion, stated:

It is important that they (the canals) should be kept free from the danger of interruption by the Governments through whose territories they pass or by hostile operation of other countries engaged in war.

While the rights of sovereignty of the local Governments must always be respected, other rights also have arisen in the progress of events involving interests of great magnitude to the commercial world and demanding its careful attention, and, if need be, its efficient protection.

In view of these interests and after having invited capital and enterprise from other countries to aid in the opening of these great highways of nations, under pledges of free transit to all desiring it, it can not be permitted that these Governments should exercise over them (the canals) arbitrary and unlimited control, and close them or embarrass them without reference to the wants of commerce or the intercourse of the world.

Equally disastrous would it be to leave them at the mercy of every nation which, in time of war, might find it advantageous, for hostile purposes, to take possession of them and either restrain their use or suspend it altogether.

Further commenting on this subject, Senator Davis in his report says:

Thus the United States in the beginning, before the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, took the same ground that is reached in the convention of February, 1900, for the universal decree of the neutral, free, and innocent use of the canal as a world's highway, where war should not exist and where the honor of all nations would be a safer protection than fortresses for its security. From that day to this these wise forecasts have been fulfilled and Europe has adopted, in the convention of Constantinople, the same great safeguard for the canal that was projected by Mr. Cass in 1857.

After the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had been adopted misunderstandings arose between this country and Great Britain as to its construction and intendment. It was claimed on the part of the United States that this treaty superseded any claim of sovereignty by Great Britain over the Mosquito Indians in that section of the country at the mouth of the San Juan River, in which an English colony was located, and that it established the complete sovereignty of Nicaragua over all this territory. Great Britain refused her assent to this construction. Neither party, however, ever claimed any misunderstanding as to the intent of both Governments to maintain a neutral canal, as free to the use of the world as though nature had made the passageway.

Lest either nation might assume to annul the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, each one took the precaution to enter into new agreements with Nicaragua, which bound that State to insure the free use of any canal she might either authorize to be built or should herself construct in her territory. Neither of them attempted to secure any special privileges.

On February 11, 1860, a treaty was drawn up between Great Britain and the Republic of Nicaragua providing for an isthmian canal. In this agreement the British Government agrees to extend her protection to all such routes of communication as may be constructed and to guarantee the neutrality and innocent use of the same. And on the other side the Nicaraguan Government agreed as follows:

No hire or other charges or tolls shall be imposed on the conveyance or transit of the persons or property of subjects of Great Britain or of subjects or citizens of any other country across the said routes of communication than are or may be imposed on the persons and property of citizens of Nicaragua.

Great Britain has never claimed or demanded exclusive control for her own vessels, but in all her treaty stipulations with either Nicaragua or any other Government in that vicinity she has insisted that the world should have exactly the same opportunities that she herself might enjoy.

Then the United States did not wish to be behind Great Britain, and a few years thereafter, and on the 21st day of June, 1867, the United States entered into an agreement with Nicaragua in almost the same words. Article 14 of this treaty provides:

The Republic of Nicaragua hereby grants to the United States and to their citizens and property the right of transit between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans through the territory of that Republic, on any route of communication, natural or artificial, whether by land or by water, which may now or hereafter exist or be constructed under the authority of Nicaragua, to be used and enjoyed in the same manner and upon equal terms by both Republics and the respective citizens.

Article 15 of this treaty provides:

No tonnage or other duties shall be imposed or levied by the Government of Nicaragua on the vessels of the United States, or on any effects or merchandise belonging to citizens or subjects of the United States, or upon the vessels or effects of any other country intended, bona fide, for transit across the said routes of communication, and not for consumption within the Republic of Nicaragua.

Remember that the South American nations have rights here as well as Great Britain and the United States. They must necessarily have more or less of a coastwise trade. This treaty related to the authority of the citizens of the United States in the construction of a canal.

In agreeing to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it was the purpose of the United States to place itself exactly in the same position it would have been in had the canal been constructed by France, by Nicaragua, or any other Central American State. We claimed no special privileges because the money represented our investment. It was believed that the tolls charged and the charges derived specially by the United States would compensate us for the investment.

Senator Davis, in his report on the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, declared its purposes in concise language and asserted boldly that the United States was to obtain no other privileges than those granted to the nations of all the world.

He states:

No American statesman, speaking with official authority or responsibility, has ever intimated that the United States would attempt to control this canal for the exclusive benefit of our Government or people. They have all, with one accord, declared that the canal was to be neutral ground in time of war, and always open, on terms of impartial equality, to the ships and commerce of the world.

Special treaties for the neutrality, impartiality, freedom, and innocent use of the two canals that are to be the eastern and western gateways of commerce between the great oceans are not in keeping with the magnitude and universality of the blessings they must confer upon mankind. The subject rather belongs to the domain of international law.

The leading powers of Europe recognized the importance of this subject in respect of the Suez Canal, and ordained a public international act for its neutralization that is an honor to the civilization of the age. It is the beneficent work of all Europe, and not of Great Britain alone. Whatever canal is built in the Isthmus of Darien will be, ultimately, made subject to the same law of freedom and neutrality as governs the Suez Canal, as a part of the laws of nations, and no single power will be able to resist its control.

The United States can not take an attitude of opposition to the principles of the great act of October 22, 1888, without discrediting the official declarations of our Government for 50 years on the neutrality of an isthmian canal and its equal use by all nations, without discrimination.

To set up the selfish motive of gain by establishing a monopoly of a highway that must derive its income from the patronage of all maritime countries would be unworthy of the United States if we owned the country through which the canal is to be built.

But the location of the canal belongs to other governments, from whom we must obtain any right to construct a canal on their territory, and it is not unreasonable, if the question was new and was not involved in a subsisting treaty with Great Britain, that she should question the right of even Nicaragua and Costa Rica to grant to our ships of commerce and of war extraordinary privileges of transit through the canal.

It is not reasonable to suppose that Nicaragua and Costa Rica would grant to the United States the exclusive control of a canal through those States on terms less generous to the other maritime nations than those prescribed in the great act of October 22, 1888; or if we could compel them to give us such advantages over other nations, it would not be creditable to our country to accept them.

On the question of the canal being built with our own money, and any special rights to be derived from that fact, Senator Davis says:

I especially call the attention of those Senators who insist that by reason of our investment we should claim some special privilege to the report upon which the Senate acted when they ratified the Hay-Pauncefote treaty:

That our Government or our people will furnish the money to build the canal presents the single question whether it is profitable to do so. If the canal, as property, is worth more than its cost we are not called on to divide the profits with other nations. If it is worth less and we are compelled by national necessities to build the canal, we have no right to call on other nations to make up the loss to us. In any view it is a venture that we will enter upon if it is to our interest, and if it is otherwise we will withdraw from its further consideration.

The Suez Canal makes no discrimination in its tolls in favor of its stockholders and, taking its profits or the half of them as our basis of calculation, we will never find it necessary to differentiate our rates of toll in favor of our own people in order to secure a very great profit on the investment.

In time of war, as in times of peace, the commerce of the world will pass through its portals in perfect security, enriching all the nations, and we of the English-speaking peoples will either forget that this grand work has ever cost us a day of bitterness, or we will rejoice that our contentions have delayed our progress until the honor has fallen to our grand Republic to number this among our best works for the good of mankind.

Now, I call the attention of Senators to the first annual message of President Cleveland. In this message, speaking on the same subject, he says:

Whatever highway may be constructed across the territory dividing the two greatest maritime areas of the world must be for the world's benefit, a trust for mankind, to be removed from the chance of domination by any single power, nor become a point of invitation for assault or a prize for warlike ambition.

Senator Morgan made a minority report, and although he differed with the majority upon the question of the point of location, that eminent scholar and historian agreed entirely with the report of the majority when he said:

The treaty under consideration is for the avowed purpose of removing any objection that may arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the United States, without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in Article VIII of that convention.

That general principle, as it is modified or specially defined in this treaty, is all that is left of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as now being in continuing force.

Again he says:

Then this convention, in Article II, proceeds to define and formulate into an agreement, intended to be world-wide in its operation, "the general principle of neutralization" established in Article VIII of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, on the basis of the treaty of Constantinople of October, 1888, relating to the Suez Canal.

Nothing is given to the United States in Article II of the convention now under consideration, nor is anything denied to us that is not given or denied to all other nations.

Now, what is this article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which we have practically adopted and declared to be the principle upon which the United States should proceed in the construction of this canal? It is as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but, also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

We guaranteed under that article not only that we would not discriminate or allow such discrimination between Great Britain and the United States, but that the same treatment should be accorded to every other foreign nation as would be accorded to those two, and thus specifically brought ourselves within the provision of "all" nations of the world.

Mr. President, is it possible, in the light of all these discussions, in the light of the history of the case, in the light of these reports, and in the light of the open discussion on the floor of the Senate, when no man on the floor of the Senate, during all of the time this Hay-Pauncefote treaty was before this body, was ever bold enough to claim that the treaty was open to the construction that the word "all" did not include the United States, that any man can now state that the United States is not included in the stipulations of the treaty? If we so intended, was it not our moral duty, a duty we owe to our own national honor and to every other nation of the world, to make that declaration clear and explicit?

We not only failed to make such claim, but by a vote of 43 to 27 we declared against any such policy. We met the question that was presented to us in the consideration of that treaty fairly and squarely. Let us see. While the matter was under consideration, Senator Bard offered the following amendment:

Strike out all of Article III and substitute the following: "Article III. The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect to the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade."

The Senate had the opportunity to declare then and there whether the United States, as a party to this solemn obligation, would insist on those rights or whether it would renounce them, and by a vote of 43 to 27 the Senate of the United States, the only body in conjunction with Great Britain that could make the law, renounced that claim forever; and it is too late for us now to come in and claim that we can evade it by any character of a subterfuge. In the face of this can we honorably claim that there was a secret understanding?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me, I think he could state it a little stronger than he did when he used the word "renounced." We were then engaged in the making of a new treaty with Great Britain, and, of course, if Great Britain would have agreed to that arrangement it would have been a legitimate contract and covenant between the two. What the Senate of the United States then did was to decline even to make that demand upon Great Britain. We declined to say that we would contend for that. We not only by that action in fact recognized that there was an obligation of that kind under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but we declined to contend that that should be surrendered by Great Britain and that a new contract should be made, to which they would not have agreed.

I wish to say, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, in this connection, as I am one of those recorded as voting in favor of the Bard amendment, that my idea at that time was not that any part of the merchant marine of the United States should have free transportation or free right of passage through the canal, but I was standing simply upon the ground that I thought the United States should have the right to control whatever tolls were imposed and discriminate in favor of our own citizens if we saw fit to do so. I do not wish myself to be considered as being committed by that vote to the principle of free passage for American ships in the canal.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the vote was clearly a declaration of our intent and purpose not to demand free tolls for our own coastwise trade. That is all that I am citing it for.

Mr. BACON. That would be true; and further than that, not to discriminate, that even if we charged tolls we would charge no greater tolls for the ships of foreign countries than for the ships of our own country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. President, in the face of this can we honorably claim that there was a secret understanding or a secret purpose in our minds to claim a construction directly opposed to what we had declared in our vote should not be our policy? If so, we were neither honest with ourselves nor with the world.

Touching the consideration of this treaty, the benefits to be derived by the United States, and the right surrendered by Great Britain—and a right surrendered is always an important consideration—Senator Davis says:

> Great Britain consents to remain under the prohibitions of article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, namely, that she shall not have authority to construct or control a canal, and consents that the United States shall be released from that obligation.

Clearly, Mr. President, does this not carry such a valuable consideration, such an important consideration, that we would be in honor and in duty bound to recognize its obligatory force? Before this Hay-Pauncefote treaty was entered into Great Britain already had a treaty with Nicaragua and, I think, another with Costa Rica, granting her or her citizens the right to construct a canal. If the United States had said to Great Britain, when we construct a canal with our money we will grant free tolls to our coastwise trade, but will not allow you to have free tolls for your coastwise trade on the eastern and western shores of Canada, I think Great Britain would have hesitated a long time before she would have surrendered her right to construct a canal in conjunction with Canada or in conjunction with any of the Central American Republics if she had desired so to do. She was interested not in dollars and cents as a measurement of coastwise trade to the same extent that we are, and in the same degree, but she was interested in the same manner that we were interested in having the same charges of tolls for her Canadian coastwise vessels placed upon an equality with ours.

> If this convention is ratified Great Britain could not negotiate with Costa Rica or Nicaragua or any other American State for any right to build, own, control, manage, regulate, or protect a canal to connect the oceans, while the United States is left free to enter upon and conclude such negotiations.

Mr. President, having secured the surrender by Great Britain of all of her treaty rights now and hereafter to either construct or be a party to or own or control any highway across the Isthmus, upon the consideration directly that we would treat the vessels of all countries exactly the same without the slightest discrimination, I say that we are in honor bound to stand by our agreement.

It has been suggested here, Mr. President, that neither Great Britain nor any other country could engage in our coastwise trade and therefore they would necessarily have no interest. But a vessel from Vancouver can engage in coastwise trade; a vessel from Victoria can engage in coastwise trade. A vessel loaded with lumber from Victoria can be taken to New York. A vessel from Seattle can take its cargo of lumber to New York. We by disregarding this treaty and allowing our own coastwise vessels to go free through the canal give a preferential right to our coastwise trade, not as against the coastwise trade of any other country, but as against any foreign competing vessel entering our ports.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to correct the Senator in the statement that a vessel carrying lumber from Vancouver to New York would be coastwise trade. It is not so designated in our legislation.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not say so.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understood the Senator to say it.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I did not. I said that while a vessel from Victoria to New York would not be coastwise trade, a vessel from Seattle to New York would be coastwise trade, and allowing one free tolls you allow the coastwise trade a preference over the other foreign vessels, and to that extent you disregard the stipulations of your treaty.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator simply misstated it. He said it would be coastwise trade. He did not mean it, I understand.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think I said it.

Mr. President, an attempt has been sought here in an argument to establish the fact that we have authority to do indirectly that which we can not do directly. I think the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] is anxious to take the floor, and I will not take up that subject this afternoon; but I do desire to discuss it at some time in the future before this measure is disposed of.

Mr. O'GORMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator from New York will allow me, I think this is a matter of such importance that we ought to have a quorum, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska suggests the absence of a quorum. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cummins	Lodge	Shively
Borah	Dillingham	McCumber	Simmons
Bourne	du Pont	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.
Bradley	Fall	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Fletcher	Massey	Smith, S. C.

Cullom	Lippitt	Sanders	Works

Mr. JONES. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is absent on this roll call and was absent on the other roll calls of the day because he is unavoidably detained from the city.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I do not share in the doubt which seems to prevail among certain Members of the Senate as to the true construction that should be placed upon the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. In my opinion there is not a line in that treaty that should prevent the United States from exempting American ships from the payment of tolls while going through the Panama Canal. If the contrary view should prevail, the American people would be much surprised that so little regard for American rights was manifested at the time of the adoption of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, because if the view alluded to be the correct one, it must follow that while the United States has expended $400,000,000 of American money in the construction of this canal, its citizens must be denied the rights that are enjoyed by the subjects of Great Britain and of every other foreign power, although the only Government under this treaty that has assumed a specific burden is the Government constructing the canal—the Government of the United States. England assumes no burden under this treaty; the other nations of the world that may come in and make use of the canal assume no specific burdens beyond the payment of the tolls and the agreement looking to the neutralization of the canal itself.

There is nothing in this treaty that can prevent England from remitting every cent of tolls paid by English ships going through the canal; there is nothing in the treaty to prevent any foreign power from remitting by subsidy or otherwise, or reimbursing by subsidy or otherwise, every dollar expended by its subjects by way of tolls. Under the construction placed upon this treaty by Senators who have spoken the only power in all the world that is hampered and shackled in its duty to its own citizenship is the one country that has expended $400,000,000 in the construction of this vast enterprise. If the view suggested by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] be a correct one, the American people may well exclaim that their rights were neglected when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was adopted, because there can be no question in any legal mind that every foreign power may do with respect to its own shipping passing through the Panama Canal what it is said America can not do with respect to American shipping; but I do not believe that that construction urged by the Senator who has just taken his seat is a true or a correct one.

Copious extracts from textbooks on international law and chapters from the history of diplomatic relations in America may be interesting but they are not always illuminating. This treaty must find its construction in the language employed within the four corners of the treaty; and I assert, with every confidence, that under the treaty the United States may do as it will with respect to the shipping of this country. Let me call your attention to the language:

ARTICLE I. The high contracting parties [England and the United States] agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

This is generally spoken of as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

In order that historical facts may be remembered, I might pause at this point to remind the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] that England has no moral right or justification in her present attitude. If it were conceded that she has some claim, some technical right to interpose this objection, it comes with a poor grace from a nation that from time to time has professed the greatest regard for the United States. England, as I have already stated, has not contributed a penny to this gigantic enterprise. In a period of political timidity the people of these United States, faithless for the time being to the Monroe doctrine, hesitated about projecting and carrying out this enterprise until Great Britain gave its approval. Ten or more years before 1850 the United States by treaty relations with the Central American States, and particularly with the then Republic of New Grenada, procured the necessary permission to construct a canal. England, hearing of it, insisted upon being a party to the enterprise. Under the belief that England would supply the funds, would furnish the money necessary, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 was signed; but that England repeatedly violated the provisions of that treaty can not be seriously disputed by any student of the diplomatic history of England and of the United States during the past 60 years.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty for years was regarded as obsolete; it had been violated by England and ignored by the United States. That was the position in 1901, 51 years afterwards, when negotiations were commenced which resulted in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the subsequent negotiations, covering a period of some years, were based upon the notion that the canal was to be built on alien soil; and in all the negotiations alluded to by the Senator from North Dakota there was never a suggestion, until 1901, that the Panama Canal would be constructed by the United States on territory of the United States. As an American, I can not but express my regret that the Government at that time so signally failed in a rigid observance of the Monroe doctrine as to permit Great Britain or any other foreign power to say, in substance, "The United States of America, with its then 80,000,000 people, can not construct an enterprise of great and vast importance on its own territory at its own expense without securing the approval of Great Britain."

To resume the language of the treaty:

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

That language I have just read is free from doubt. It says, in substance, that the Government of the United States will possess and enjoy all the rights of ownership, except as indicated in the treaty—subject only to the provisions of the present treaty—the United States will enjoy exclusive control and power over the canal.

Now we proceed to article 3:

The United States adopts—

I call your attention to the use of the word "adopts"—

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say—

This is one of the rules adopted by the United States by virtue of the express command of the treaty—

the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules.

The United States adopts the rules; the United States makes the rules, and then the treaty proceeds to say that—

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all the nations observing these rules, indicating at once, as it is clear to my mind, a distinction between the government that makes the rules and the government that observes the rules. To repeat:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation—

That is, one of the nations observing the rules—

or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

I do not see room for doubt as to the construction that should be placed upon so much of article 3 as I have already read. In substance, it provides that the United States will adopt certain rules, and that there shall be equality observed among the nations observing those rules which have been prescribed by the United States.

If we were to concede that the United States was placed on an absolute equality with other nations, it would even then follow that this treaty would not be violated by the United States extending to our coastwise vessels exemption from tolls, because the language is:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects.

The words "so that there shall be no discrimination" necessarily qualify the preceding words "on terms of entire equality"; and the paramount thought is that there will be no discrimination practiced among those nations observing the rules which are laid down by the United States.

There can not be discrimination unless there is an interference with competition; there can never be discrimination where there is not now and where there has not been competition. There is no competition between American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade and foreign vessels, and therefore, in that aspect alone, there would be no violation of the treaty, even though generally the views of the Senator were correct. But if the vital proposition that I advance to you should not be correct—and that proposition, to be clear, is that the nations referred to in subdivision 1 of article 3 do not embrace the United States, because they are confined to the nations observing the rules which the United States have prescribed—if you are to give this a strict reading and a narrow and unreasonable interpretation, every time an American man of war passes through our canal you would have to pay a toll, because the language is:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations.

Who will claim that it was necessary for the United States publicly to declare that our canal would be open to our own vessels of war? And yet, unless you draw a distinction between the United States and all the other nations, you must say that there was some reason for the United States declaring that her own vessels of war could use her own canal. That is a preposterous suggestion which can not find lodgment in any mind in this body.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WARREN. Will it disturb the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Not at all.

Mr. WARREN. I am much interested in the remarks of the Senator from New York, and they are along the line of my own thought. I want to ask him what would be the worst that could happen if we were wrong and should enact the legislation proposed and the matter should go to The Hague? Would it not be at the utmost simply to return the money we had collected?

Mr. O'GORMAN. That would, in my judgment, be the extreme penalty; but I do not believe Great Britain would ever attempt to make this the subject of inquiry by The Hague court, because she would be without moral support, and she would be giving the lie to her professions of sincerity and good will of a century.

Mr. WARREN. I agree with the Senator, but in legislation as in business it is always best to look at both sides and to know what the relations might be and what the alternatives. It seems to me that the worst that could happen would be, after collecting the tolls and enjoying for a time the use of the money, to find that we might be compelled to return all or some portion of it; and that would be the extreme penalty.

Mr. O'GORMAN. And that would bring its compensation, because it would inevitably lead to the denunciation of this treaty and its abrogation.

Mr. WARREN. And an entire settlement as to all questions.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Yes. It strikes me that that is the natural working out of the problem.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Now, will Senators let me call their attention to another circumstance?

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him on another point—the matter of warships? I said nothing about it while I was speaking. The Senator from New York says very justly that the provision is as to ships of commerce and war. We must pay the toll on our own warship going through the canal.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If this narrow, unfounded, and unreasonable interpretation is to prevail.

Mr. LODGE. If that is to apply. But if we pay the toll on our own warship, the money goes into our own Treasury and the warship goes through free, practically, does it not?

Mr. O'GORMAN. That would be the effect.

Mr. LODGE. I mean that is the effect. The warship goes through free. Why is it not indirectly a violation of the treaty and of good faith to let our warship go through free? That is only a point which I thought worth considering.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The second paragraph of subdivision 1 of article 3 reads as follows:

> The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it.

Now, if the view advanced by the Senator from North Dakota be true, this is a prohibition on the conduct of the United States. The United States can never blockade its own canal. This canal, upon which we have expended almost half a billion dollars, is to be kept open even as a means of transit for the war vessels of an enemy bent upon doing destruction upon our coasts. Who is there in the Senate who will assert that under this treaty we are not at liberty, for our own defense and in protection of our own citizens, to blockade that canal whenever the public welfare demands it? That is a right reserved to us, but enjoyed by no other nation; and that must follow if my previous proposition be a correct one—that the nations spoken of in subdivision 1 of article 3 do not embrace the United States.

As I have pointed out, the right of absolute ownership is recognized in the United States by this treaty, subject only to such rules as the United States adopts under the language of the treaty, and then the treaty as to neutralization is enforceable against all nations observing the rules prescribed by the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from New York read the first two lines of the second paragraph of article 3 of the treaty, but did not read the following, to wit:

> The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

The first two lines, which the Senator did read, provide that "the canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it." If the United States is not subject to these rules, why was it thought necessary, in the language I have read, to specifically exempt the United States from a prohibition against policing the canal?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I can not imagine that it will be claimed that that is an exclusive right, and in my judgment it is quite consistent with the general right of ownership and control asserted by the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the United States is not governed by these rules, it would have the right to blockade the canal, would it not?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have asserted that, and I would be surprised to hear a Senator in this body declare that in the face of an enemy the United States was powerless to shut out war vessels bent upon doing destruction to our commerce and our people.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The right to blockade does not apply simply where we are at war with somebody else. This provision here is that the canal shall be free and open to the ships of all nations observing the rules. I understand the Senator claims that we are not one of the nations which are to observe any of these rules.

Mr. O'GORMAN. We make the rules, and we insist upon uniformity in their observance by the nations making use of our canal.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But is it the Senator's position that we make these rules and enforce them against all other nations and that we alone are at liberty to violate them?

Mr. O'GORMAN. No; we do not violate them. We are not bound by the language of the treaty to observe the rules now referred to. That duty rests upon the other nations. We make the rules. The other nations observe them and thus are permitted to use our canal. That is the precise language of the treaty. We build the canal and permit the nations of the world to use it on certain terms which they must respect.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator does not think we ourselves are bound to observe any of the rules?

Mr. O'GORMAN. No further than our obligations go. One of the rules is that we will work no discrimination among these foreign nations. We must observe that requirement, and in return for that the foreign nation making use of our canal will pay the reasonable toll charges and will subscribe to the doctrine of the neutralization of the canal. But we are untrammeled in all our rights except where specific restraint is placed upon us, and the only restraint in substance is that we shall work no discrimination among the nations of the earth in allowing their vessels to use our canal. When we put all foreign nations on the same basis as regards tolls, we do all that can reasonably be required of us. Under the view contended for on the floor this morning England's rights in the Panama Canal are superior to ours, although England has not contributed a dollar to the enterprise.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think that is exactly the position which was taken by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], if I understood him correctly, because he stated when he reported the treaty to the Senate that he did not understand that "all nations" included the United States.

Mr. O'GORMAN. He distinctly stated that if he had understood that that interpretation was possible he would never have reported this treaty. As chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations he reported the treaty and believed that the United States might do as Congress saw fit with respect to our own citizens.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. So he did. And now, if I understand him correctly, notwithstanding the fact that that was his view at the time the treaty was reported, he yet favors the abandonment of our rights, and in solving the doubt that ought to be solved in favor of the United States he solves it in favor of Great Britain, so that this matter may go to The Hague with the impression given it by the Senate that we have solved the doubt against our own people.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. I well remember the brief discussion I had with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] before our committee in regard to this matter; and I think I was quite persistent in asking him why, if we meant "all other nations," we did not put in the word "other" and make ourselves understood.

But, it seems to me, there is another fact that should be considered in connection with what the Senator from Oregon has just said; that is, that we discussed this whole proposition in 1901, when the treaty was before the Senate. I observe that the senior Senator from Georgia at that time moved, as I have it here, to strike from the preamble the words "without impairing the general principle of neutralization," and so forth, and also to strike out all of sections 3 and 4.

But the point I wish to raise, and especially to call the attention of the Senator from New York to, is that at the time the amendment was being considered Mr. Bard—who, I think, was then a Senator from California—moved to strike out article 3 and substitute the following:

ART. III. The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.

This amendment, after discussion before the Senate at that time, was voted down by a vote of 43 to 27. In the discussion, if I remember correctly, it appeared that if we had not done this we could not have made the treaty with Great Britain at that time.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Is it not possible, as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, that the reason that change was not made was because he and his associates believed that the United States, the owner of the canal, the Nation that prescribed the rules for others to follow, was not bound by the terms she imposed upon others, except in so far that she would work no discrimination among foreign nations with respect to the use of the canal?

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, if I may be allowed to reply, that may be correct. But it seems to me we are foreclosed when it is shown by the RECORD that after a long debate, and after having this matter brought up and discussed at that time as it is being discussed now, we abandoned our position by a vote of almost two to one—43 to 27.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not desire to intrude upon the Senator's time, for I know he is in a hurry. But I intended, at the close of the speech of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], to call the attention of the senior Senator from Georgia to page 4 of the views of the minority in the House report on the House bill, where the following is stated:

With further reference to the Bard amendment, we have been granted authority to quote from a letter recently written by Senator Bard, in the course of which he states:

"When my amendment was under consideration it was generally conceded by Senators that even without that specific provision the rules of the treaty would not prevent our Government from treating the canal as part of our coast line, and consequently could not be construed as a restriction of our interstate commerce, forbidding the discrimination in charges for tolls in favor of our coastwise trade, and this conviction contributed to the defeat of the amendment."

He states there that "it was generally conceded by Senators that even without that specific provision the rules of the treaty would not prevent our Government from treating the canal as part of our coast line."

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is in accord with the recollection of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wanted to ask the Senator from Georgia how it accorded with his recollection of what was generally conceded among Senators, if he recalls.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am very glad to respond definitely to the Senator; but my recollection is very much in accord with what has been stated by the Senator from Massachusetts as his—that there was really little or no expression upon the subject. I have no recollection of any such general consensus of opinion, and I am very frank to say that I myself have never been of that opinion. I was not then, and I am not now.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Which opinion?

Mr. BACON. That under the general terms of the treaty that right would exist without the adoption of the Bard amendment.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator thinks it would?

Mr. BACON. I think it would not. I repeat that I do not recall that there was much said on the sbject, and in that respect the recollection of the Senator from Massachusetts agrees with mine.

My own recollection of my mental attitude is simply this: I myself voted for the Bard amendment, not because I had ever been in favor of the free passage of ships through the canal, but because at that time, when we were making a treaty, when we were fixing terms which, if agreed to, would be binding upon both parties, I was of the opinion that if we could do so it would be to our interest to make the best terms we could, which would leave us as free as practicable to manage the canal according to our own judgment and our preferences as to favor to our own ships or foreign ships.

I think the Senator will find there were other amendments for which I voted, though I have not had an opportunity to look the matter over carefully. My general recollection is, however, that there was one which gave the right of fortification and defense, as to which I was also of the same mind, believing that if we could get an agreement with Great Britain to that effect it was to our interest to secure to ourselves as perfect and as complete control of the canal in all particulars as was practicable or possible.

Therefore I voted on that side, not with a view to the free passage of our own ships through the canal, but with the view that if we saw fit to discriminate in favor of them in any degree we should be at liberty to do so—in other words, that we should be free to do as we thought best thereafter.

I always have recognized, however, or at least I always have been of the opinion since then, and was at that time, that the intent and understanding of the treaty was that we did not secure what I attempted to secure by voting for those two amendments. There may be others. I have not had the opportunity to look into the matter of late, but I recollect those two amendments.

Mr. WORKS and Mr. BURTON addressed the Chair.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Connecticut has anticipated what I was about to say by reading from the records a statement made by Senator Bard with respect to his amendment and the reason why it was voted down.

I simply wish to say that I have in my hand the original letter of Senator Bard making that statement—that the reason for voting down his amendment was that it was generally regarded by the Senate as unnecessary, and that that construction should be placed upon the treaty irrespective of any amendment of that kind.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. In answer to the suggestions of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], I will say that I think it was quite generally understood then that the reason for voting down the proposition to authorize the fortification in express terms was that under the treaty we had the right to fortify without that particular provision. I know I was here at the time, although I do not recall all of the speeches. But while some of us voted insisting in some instances that these things should be explicit and in others voting with the majority upon the ground that they were covered anyhow, I believe, both with reference to the coastwise trade and especially with reference to the question of fortification, that many of the votes cast against those express provisions were cast upon the theory that without them we nevertheless had the right to do them.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That the provisions were unnecessary?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; that they were unnecessary.

Mr. O'GORMAN. In that connection, Mr. President, I wish to observe that if the views advanced by the senior Senator from Ohio yesterday be correct with respect to the construction of this treaty, then you declare that whatever may be the emergency, the United States can not fortify the canal; and no matter how great may be the menace from an enemy, we must permit the enemy to use our canal to aid in working havoc upon our coasts and upon our people.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. BURTON. I have not my remarks before me; but if the Senator from New York will do me the honor to read them carefully, he will find that no such inference as that could be derived from them.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I understood that the Senator from Ohio and my own colleague declared, either yesterday or the day before, that we could not exempt our own shipowners from paying tolls through the canal without violating this treaty; and I take issue on that proposition.

Mr. BURTON. I stated that both in regard to the coastwise and the foreign trade. I am confident in that opinion. But as regards fortifying the canal, I made a statement that is quite the contrary of that ascribed to me by the Senator.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am asserting my view and my opinion that if it be conceded that the remission of tolls to our shipowners works a violation of this treaty, then it must follow that we can not fortify the canal.

Mr. BURTON. Then, as I understand, the statement of the Senator from New York is based on an inference that the assertion of equality of tolls and the denial of the right to remit the tolls necessarily carries with it the inference that there can be no policing of the canal, no protection of it, and that in time of war we are helpless against the ships of an enemy.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have spoken in vain if I have not made it clear to Senators that my proposition is that under the treaty the United States is in exclusive control of and power over the canal, subject only to the granting to foreign nations of the right to make use of it for the purposes of transit without discrimination as among themselves; and that therefore this rule, which relates to the nations observing these terms, does not embrace the United States. The United States prescribes, creates, and establishes the rule; and the treaty itself makes a manifest distinction between the creator of the rule and those who under its express terms are required to observe it.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I was unfortunately absent until a few moments ago, and I did not hear all the remarks of the Senator from New York. What I expressly desire to understand, however, is his view on this subject: Does a rule against discrimination in favor of our own domestic shipping, and our foreign shipping as well, by implication prevent us from fortifying the canal or exercising preference for our own ships in time of war?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes; because if the Senator's view is to prevail it must follow that the inhibition placed upon the various nations embraces and is applicable to the United States. If that narrow view be adopted, it will follow that even as to the United States the canal can never be blockaded. There is no affirmative declaration of the right of the Nation or any nation to fortify it, and it must be found in the general right residing in the United States to exercise all powers of ownership and dominion, except in the one respect to which I have called the attention of the Senator.

Mr. BURTON. I must maintain that there is an absolutely vital distinction between the two, based on the difference between a state of peace and a state of war, between commercial ships and warships.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. LODGE. In connection with the matter of fortification, the original treaty, the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, contained, in article 2, section 7, a provision that—

No fortifications shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent.

That was left out of the second treaty, and purposely left out. The first treaty also included the amendment put in by the committee and agreed to by the Senate:

It is agreed, however, that none of the immediate foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order.

I know that the omission of the prohibition of fortifications in the second treaty was considered all sufficient.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I was absent from the Chamber a moment ago, and therefore it may be that without my knowledge the Senator from New York has referred to what I am about to suggest. I do it to emphasize what he has already said.

If these rules are applicable to the United States—that is, if the phrase "all nations" embraces the United States—then I suggest that rule 3 is also mandatory upon us.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That would follow.

Mr. CUMMINS. It provides:

Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary.

I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio, or any other Senator who takes his view of the case, whether, in the event of a war in which the United States is one of the belligerents, it would be a violation of this treaty if one of our ships should take on supplies in or about the canal?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I answer the question most emphatically "no," because a state of war suspends treaties. There are certain rights that are secured by treaties which, if not abrogated, are at least suspended by a condition of war.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why, Mr. President, it is a state of war that is provided for in the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Surely the Senator from Ohio does not mean to suggest that if we have a war with Japan or Germany that suspends a treaty between us and Great Britain.

Mr. BURTON. No; I thought that was clearly understood—that it is a treaty with the country with which we are at war.

Mr. LODGE. I do not understand that the Senator from suspends a treaty between us and Great Britain.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the United States were at war with any country, under the terms of this treaty, if we observed it according to the rule laid down by the Senator from Ohio, we would be a belligerent, and we would no more be permitted to supply our ships in the Canal Zone than would the ships of the other belligerent.

I also call the attention of the Senator from New York to the further provision:

No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

If the United States is within the phrase "all nations," then that provision would apply upon us in the event of a war between us and any other country in the world. I simply mention this because I think the conclusions of the Senator from New York are absolutely unanswerable.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Iowa. Can it be possible that any construction could be placed upon the treaty that would prevent us from disembarking troops on our own territory between the two ends of the canal or loading or unloading munitions of war upon our territory on the land?

Mr. CUMMINS. If the phrase "all nations" includes the United States, then in the event of a war between the United States and any other country we would be denied those privileges and those rights in the canal, according to the terms of the treaty.

Mr. HEYBURN. Suppose a war existed between the United States and some nation that was not a party to the treaty.

Mr. CUMMINS. Under the terms of the treaty, as interpreted by the Senator from Ohio, that would make no difference whatsoever.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is there not some basis for interpreting the treaty so that it would not include our Government within the term "all nations"?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it is a conclusive reason for not interpreting the treaty in that way.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, to resume, there were six rules laid down in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which were to be observed by all foreign nations. Free and uninterrupted use of the canal for the purposes of commerce and of war constitutes the first paragraph which I have read. Your attention has been called to the substance of one or two of the other paragraphs; but it must be clear if any one of these rules is applicable all the six rules are applicable; and with respect to the question as to whether they are applicable to the United States, as has been very aptly pointed out by the Senator from Iowa, under the third rule the United States could not revictual its vessels or supply its vessels with stores in its own canal—the most extraordinary proposition I think that has ever been advanced in this body.

Under the fourth rule the United States, in its own canal, could not embark or disembark troops. I insist that under the language of this treaty it was never understood or expected that any of these restrictions or inhibitions would apply to the United States. The people of this country never believed that they were expending a vast amount of money to construct a canal in the regulation of which we were impotent without the consent of Great Britain.

The junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] during the day called attention to the fact that in the preamble of the treaty some reference is made to article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850. If you refer to article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty you will find that it has little or no application. If it has any application at all, it is confined to the words recited in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which speak of the observance of the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

That everything in article 8 can not be invoked now is apparent from the circumstance that in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty by article 8 it was contemplated that England as well as the United States would guarantee the neutralization of the canal, which canal, by the by, as I have already stated, was to be built through foreign territory. Under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty England assumes no responsibilities respecting the protection of the neutralization of the canal. All those responsibilities were assumed by the United States, and the canal is being constructed on United States territory. The comments made by the junior Senator from Georgia, therefore, should not be permitted to interfere with the force of the suggestions I have made as to the true construction and interpretation that should be placed upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Now, it may not be proper to go beyond the purely legal aspects of this problem, and up to the present I have endeavored to confine myself to a legal consideration of the import and the meaning of the words employed. Yet there are other considerations of importance, though perhaps not bearing at all upon the question of the true interpretation. Free tolls in the canal is the doctrine of the Democratic Party of the United States. We believe that free tolls make for cheap food and for ultimate benefit to the consumer. We want through that canal the highest and best development of competition. We are against the railroad organizations of this country placing their hands upon that canal and making it a part of their corporate assets. We believe the canal is but an extension of our national highway. Although we have spent, as I have said, upward of $400,000,000 in the construction of that canal, we have spent much more than $400,000,000 in the development of the waterways of this country during the past 50 years. We have not been taxed as citizens of the United States for making use of the increased facilities of our national highways. Unless there is some reason for abandoning that policy we should permit American citizens, the owners of American ships, to make use of this extension of our coast line without subjecting them to a tax which would be entirely inconsistent with the policy of the Government in the past.

It may well have excited some surprise that Great Britain, with all her professions of friendship for this country, would seek to control and restrict our efforts on a plea which can not be invoked against herself, because, as I have said, under the treaty, which reflects no credit upon the treaty-making branch of our Government, England assumes no obligation whatever. There is no mutuality of obligation. She can subsidize every British vessel going through the canal, and yet under this treaty we could not complain if England did that. We could not complain if any other foreign nation did that. Spain has already legislated to reimburse Spanish ships for the tolls they may pay going through our canal. We can not complain. Those countries have the right to do that. But is it possible that the right possessed by every other nation on earth with respect to our canal is denied to our own citizens by a composition or convention called a treaty not remarkable for its precision of expression or for respect for the Monroe doctrine, that great principle upon which our institutions have prospered?

One might suppose that Great Britain in taking this extraordinary, unreasonable, unfriendly attitude must have been moved by some sinister purpose or impulse. I do not believe Great Britain is much concerned as to whether we allow American ships to go through the canal without the payment of toll or not. I believe, however, that the railroads of Canada and the railroads of the United States have been enabled to secure the cooperation of the British foreign office to embarrass this Government in the attempt we are now making for wholesome legislation to keep railroad-controlled ships off the canal that competition may live and thrive and that this national enterprise shall not be handed over to the railroad organizations of the United States.

The railroad corporations have been incorporated for railroad purposes; and they have destroyed competition wherever they have been permitted to secure control of competing water transportation facilities.

Reference was made to-day to the declarations of ex-President Cleveland and other Executives. They have all been unanimous in the thought that the building of a great canal connecting the two oceans would make for competition, wholesome competition, in transportation. To secure that great end, in my judgment, it is necessary to resort to what may seem drastic legislation, but which I believe is the only cure of an evil great in its importance and in its possibilities for injury to the American people.

Mr. President, with respect to the immediate proposition before us, I entertain no doubt that as a matter of governmental policy we should exempt from the payment of tolls all American shipping going through the canal. I am confident that such action by the American Congress would not violate the language and can not violate the spirit of the treaty that has been invoked against us.

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question, with his permission. I am asking it for information. The Senator is on the committee, and doubtless has given this matter serious consideration. I am not on it, and I have not had the opportunity to have the information which the committee has doubtless secured and which has not yet fully developed in this discussion.

The Senator has alluded to the importance of this proposed provision in the law as it will affect the question of the power and ability of the railroad companies to control this water transportation. The question which I ask the Senator, not arguendo but for information, is whether a provision giving generally to all American ships the right to free passage through the canal is essential in order to prevent a monopoly by the railroad companies or whether that end will be accomplished by simply prohibiting railroad-owned ships from doing so?

I am frank to say to the Senator that I am fully in sympathy with the desire to prevent railroad companies, through the ownership of ships going through the canal, from monopolizing that route of commerce. If it be true that in order to defeat that it is necessary that all American ships have the right of free passage, it is certainly a very strong argument in favor of it. Therefore I desire to know from the Senator whether that is essential or whether the end will be accomplished by prohibiting railroad-owned ships from going through.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I believe that both things are essential. It was the judgment of some of the committee that considered this problem that monopoly might be prevented by extending the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission over water transportation, and that the matter might be controlled by regulation as the Interstate Commerce Commission now attempts to regulate railroad rates and traffic.

Two of the most experienced members of that commission testified before our committee that as a result of their observation and study of railroad regulation the only certain method of preventing a monopoly by the railroads was to prohibit a road from having any interest, direct or indirect, in water transportation in any part of the United States; and my study has confirmed the wisdom of that view. As an instance, every foot of railroad in the United States east of the city of New York is now controlled by one corporation. Years ago it was made up of numerous small companies. They were absorbed from time to time until the entire system covering every foot of railroad track in New England is now under the control of one corporation. The one competing condition with the railroads of New England was water transportation by Long Island Sound, by boats running to New Haven, Bridgeport, New London, Providence, and Boston.

There are 37 boats doing an extensive business in Long Island Sound, supposedly competing with the New England railway system, known as the New York & New Haven Railroad. Of the 37 boats, 35 are owned and controlled by the railroad and 1 or 2 independent boats are attempting to survive under a cutting competition, which in a short time will drive them out of business.

The city of Bridgeport is one of the most important cities in New England—a great manufacturing city. The tracks of the New Haven Railroad run through that city about half a mile back from the water front. Every pound of merchandise going in and out of that city must go either by the tracks of the New Haven road or by boat to or from Bridgeport. The city of Bridgeport does not own one foot of frontage on the Sound—every foot of it is owned by the railroad. You must patronize that one railroad whether you travel by rail or by boat; and I believe it is the only place in the United States, and perhaps the only time in the history of traffic conditions in the United States, where the charge by water is as great as that by land. It is known to every student of economics that the cost of water transportation is much cheaper than is that of transportation by rail; but with the tremendous business done along Long Island Sound by the boats owned by this railroad, they exact and compel and receive from the consumer the same rate by boat that they get by rail.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to ask the Senator from New York if it is not a fact that it developed before his committee that practically the same condition which he has so ably discussed as existing in New England exists on the Pacific coast, and that the transcontinental lines not only fix the transcontinental rates, but that they control the boats running between points along the northwest coast and the Isthmus of Panama?

Mr. O'GORMAN. It is a common condition all over this country; and it is for that reason, I believe, that the judgment expressed by the two members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, Mr. Lane and Judge Prouty, should prevail. They declare, as the result of years of observation and experience, that the only wholesome legislation Congress can now enact in respect to this matter is to prohibit railroad-controlled boats using the Panama Canal or the waterways of the country.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Could the Senator tell us what proportion of the coastwise trade is now carried in boats that are controlled by railroad companies?

Mr. O'GORMAN. My impression is that a very considerable quantity of the coastwise trade, surely a majority of it, is now controlled by the railroads of the country; but if the legislation of which I speak is enacted, that condition will cease.

Mr. REED. One further question. Could the Senator tell us to what extent the coastwise trade is now controlled by one management, so that it may be said to what extent it approaches a monopoly of management or a combination of management?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have a strong belief on the subject, Mr. President, but I have no exact information available. My belief is that the railroads have an injurious influence upon water transportation because of their control of it to-day, and that the sooner a change is made divorcing rail transportation from water transportation, the better it will be for the people of the country, and perhaps for those interested in such industries. I am not opposed to railroads. They have contributed much to the growth of our country. I shall never fail to defend them when they are right, but I am unalterably opposed to the creation of monopolies.

Mr. REED. One further question, with the indulgence of the Senator. The Senator's view, I take it, is that railroad-controlled boats should not be permitted to use the Panama Canal on the same terms that other boats are permitted to use it, or that they should be perhaps excluded altogether?

Mr. O'GORMAN. That they should be entirely excluded.

Mr. REED. Would it not be necessary to add to that provision a further provision that no vessels controlled by any company that is engaged in any combination to control rates shall also be excluded?

Mr. O'GORMAN. The proposed legislation might well be improved by the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. PERCY. I understood the Senator from New York to say that he thought the only method of preventing a monopoly of shipping through the canal by the railroads was by prohibiting railroad-owned vessels from going through the canal. I should like to ask him if he does not think that railroad monopoly would be absolutely prevented, and much better shipping facilities be given, by amending the coastwise navigation laws to the extent of permitting vessels of all nations to carry passengers and freight from a port or ports on the Atlantic coast to a port or ports on the Pacific coast through the Panama Canal. I will call the Senator's attention to the fact that in quoting the statement of the Interstate Commerce Commission he said it was their opinion that the only method of preventing railroad monopoly was by prohibiting railroad-owned vessels from operating through the canal. In reply to the question which I have propounded to the Senator, the Interstate Commerce Commissioners said that unquestionably that provision would absolutely prevent any monopoly by the railroads. I would like to ask the Senator's opinion on that question.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If, upon reflection, I could be persuaded that it would be as effective a means as the one I propose to make monopoly impossible, I would give it the same hearty support that I am urging in behalf of my own proposition.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I shall not ask the Senator to reply now to the question I am about to ask, if for any reason he desires to desist from further remarks, but it is a matter of very grave importance to those of us who are not on the committee and who have not had an opportunity to obtain the information that has been given to the committee to get definite suggestion and opinion upon this particular subject. The question that has been discussed this afternoon is as to the policy, to say nothing of the power, of the United States in permitting all vessels engaged in the coastwise trade to pass free of toll through the canal. The Senator from New York has very ably discussed that question, and we have all been very much entertained and enlightened with the views expressed by him; but in the latter part of the remarks of the learned Senator he went on to apply the matter of the free passage of the coastwise American ships through the canal as one additional argument, through the application of which the monopoly of the railroads would be defeated. What I want to get from the Senator—I repeat I will not insist upon an answer now, but I hope during the debate we shall have a discussion of the question—is this: We will all concede, for the purpose of this branch of the argument, that in order to break up the monopoly of the railroads railroad-owned ships should not be allowed to go through the canal. Eliminating that feature from consideration now, the question upon which I desire to have information, and which I hope will be fully discussed, is, Does the free passage of coastwise American ships, other than railroad-owned ships, through the canal have any connection with the question of the monopoly of the trade by the railroads?

Mr. O'GORMAN. It is an additional assurance of free competition and of cheap goods. If, for instance, American coastwise boats are permitted to go through the canal without paying toll, it will become necessary for the railroads competing with the canal to reduce their rates proportionately to meet the price at which goods carried by such bottoms through the canal will reach the consumer. They are not necessarily associated, but both contribute to the one most desirable end of promoting the welfare of the ultimate consumer, and not to allow our conduct to be governed or controlled by regard for class or special interests.

Mr. BACON. I understand that argument, of course. It very naturally appears to be so, that the free passage of American coastwise ships through the canal, if there is competition between them, will necessarily reduce rates. Recognizing that, I come back to the question—because that is the important question, whether or not—I concede it may tend to reduce railroad rates, because they have to come in competition with ships passing through the canal; but to come back to the question, Does it affect the question of monopoly by the railroads? I am asking, I repeat, not as a matter of argument, but for the purpose of getting the views of the distinguished and learned Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I am a member of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, but there is a good deal as a member of the committee that I have not been able to settle in my own mind, and one proposition about which I would like to ask the opinion of the Senator, if he desires to give it or has an opinion upon it, is, What will be the effect of denying to our railroads the right to own ships when we are face to face with the proposition that the Canadian railroads will own ships and utilize them through this canal?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Unquestionably it would affect the railroad-owned ships of the world. If we deny the right to our own railroads to control ships, the same rule and policy would apply to Canadian railroad-owned ships or to English railroad-owned ships.

Mr. BORAH. As a general proposition that is true; but we would be in a most difficult position to make a practical application of and to execute it, would we not?

Mr. O'GORMAN. At any time a foreign railroad-owned ship appeared for the purpose of passing through the canal, the United States officers there could make their own inquiry and investigation, and if they were satisfied that the ship about to enter the canal was controlled by a railroad company, directly or indirectly, they would prevent the ship from passing through. Of course, the statute might be evaded; but——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. Presient——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to suggest, if the Senator will permit me, that ships owned by the Canadian railways can not engage in the coastwise trade of the United States unless they are ships of American register; if ships of American register, they would sail from American ports; and the Canadian railroads having termini in the United States are subject to the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission and would come under the same rules and the same statutes as would the American railroads.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, just a word. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Kansas, who is very familiar with this proposition, suppose we do deny the right of the railroads to own ships, we will at some time or other, I presume, have to put them under the regulation and control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, or some other commission, or else they will have a monopoly of their own and a combination of their own. They will have to be supervised and regulated and controlled at some time or other in their traffic and in their rates, the same as we regulate the railroads, will they not?

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, if a monopoly be organized by the steamships that ply between the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts of the United States through the canal, it ought to be dealt with the same as any other monopoly of transportation, and I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, for any provision to go into this bill that will look to the prevention of such monopoly and the maintenance of competition on the sea between the carriers by sea; but, because such a thing might be, it can not be a justification for permitting a monopoly that now exists to continue, a monopoly between the railroads and the steamship lines which are owned by them and which are presumed to compete with them.

Mr. BORAH. That is quite true; I am in accord with what the Senator says as to preventing a monopoly which now exists to continue; but it will not be very effective if we simply transfer the seat of power from one organization to another.

Mr. BRISTOW. I thoroughly agree with the Senator as to that, and shall be glad to join with him or any other Senator in endeavoring to anticipate such a possible combination, which is very much more difficult, I will say, by sea than by land, because, if I am not intruding upon the time of the Senator from

New York, the sea is open. Any company can charter a vessel—they need not necessarily have great wealth—and can use the water, because the water is the open highway; but no company, unless it be backed by tremendous wealth, can conduct a transcontinental railway or use such a railway in the carrying of commerce.

The railway is by its very nature a monopoly, while the sea is open. All one has to do is to purchase or hire a ship and put it on the water to seek commerce wherever it is to be found. So that a monopoly by sea is very much more difficult to organize and maintain, but it is not impossible, and the Senator from Idaho can be no more desirous than am I to provide against that contingency, if it appears to be a danger.

Mr. BORAH. It is not only not impossible, but it is entirely probable that it will happen. I do not see how the fact that the highway is open would be of very much avail against a combination which could drive others off the highway, whatever its width or latitude might be, by reason of the rates which they would fix until they did drive the others off the sea.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is——

Mr. O'GORMAN. I might say there is no doubt that to-day there is something of a monopoly in water transportation. There is a monopoly that embraces most of the ocean steamship lines, that embraces a large part of our coastwise traffic, and in time it will have to be corrected. But we can not work a cure of all the evils at one time or in one bill. If we succeed in accomplishing what we are trying to do with this legislation we will be making some progress, and our efforts will be effective when we take up the problem suggested by the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I now yield to the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask for information, and I want to ask the question of the Senator from New York, because in addition to being a member of this committee and an able Senator he has been an able judge.

It is clear to my mind that under the provisions of this treaty we have no right to make any discrimination by charges against the vessels of any other nation. It is also clear to my mind that whether this treaty be an unfortunate one or not—and I agree with the Senator from New York that it was unfortunate and that our own interests as a nation were neglected when it was entered into—we must still construe it within the four corners of the instrument itself.

But I am not clear upon this point, and upon it I desire information. It is whether or not the exemption of our coastwise vessels would be a discrimination.

Now, I find, if the Senator from New York will pardon me, a case which has been referred to previously, but not any part of it was read. It is to be found in One hundred and ninety-fifth United States and is the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Olsen against Smith. In this case American vessels in the coastwise trade were exempted from certain pilotage charges imposed by the State of Texas.

The case went up on several points, but only one of them affects the particular matter we are now discussing, and although this is the decision of the United States Supreme Court and, of course, is not internationally binding, it seems to me a great deal of regard might be paid to the principle announced in this decision.

Now, the language of the court is this:

> Nor is there merit in the contention that, as the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port, the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with a treaty between Great Britain and the United States, providing that "no higher"—

This is the language of the treaty—

> no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.

That is the language of the treaty. Now, here is the language of the court proceeding with it:

> Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance, the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

Now, if this national principle of law be internationally sound, and even if under this treaty we can make no discrimination, the question which suggests itself to my mind is whether the exemption of coastwise vessels would be a discrimination; whether it could be a discrimination against foreign vessels of any sort, because foreign vessels of no kind can engage in the coastwise trade. Upon that point I should like to have the opinion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I did state some time since, and I now repeat, a principle in harmony with the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Olsen v. Smith in One hundred and ninety-fifth United States. There can not be discrimination unless there is an interference with competition, and there can be no competition between a foreign ship and a local ship engaged in the coastwise trade. Therefore, on principle as well as on authority, the proposition made by the Senator from Mississippi seems to be well sustained and should dispose of all doubt with respect to the provision affecting coastwise trade.

APPENDIX A.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY OF APRIL 19, 1850.

The United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty, being desirous of consolidating the relations of amity which so happily subsist between them, by setting forth and fixing in a convention their views and intentions with reference to any means of communication by ship canal which may be constructed between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the way of the River San Juan de Nicaragua and either or both of the lakes of Nicaragua or Managua to any port or place on the Pacific Ocean, the President of the United States has conferred full powers on John M. Clayton, Secretary of State of the United States, and Her Britannic Majesty on the Right Honorable Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer, a member of Her Majesty's most honorable privy council, knight commander of the most honorable Order of the Bath, and envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Her Britannic Majesty to the United States, for the aforesaid purpose; and the said plenipotentiaries having exchanged their full powers, which were found to be in proper form, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICTLE 1.

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal, agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume, or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have to or with any state or people, for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same; nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any state or government through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other.

ARTICLE 2.

Vessels of the United States or Great Britain traversing the said canal shall, in case of war between the contracting parties, be exempted from blockade, detention, or capture by either of the belligerents; and this provision shall extend to such a distance from the two ends of the said canal as may hereafter be found expedient to establish.

ARTICLE 3.

In order to secure the construction of the said canal, the contracting parties engage that if any such canal shall be undertaken upon fair and equitable terms by any parties having the authority of the local government or governments through whose territory the same may pass, then the persons employed in making the said canal, and their property used, or to be used, for that object, shall be protected, from the commencement of the said canal to its completion, by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, from unjust detention, confiscation, seizure, or any violence whatsoever.

ARTICLE 4.

The contracting parties will use whatever influence they respectively exercise with any state, states, or governments possessing or claiming to possess any jurisdiction or right over the territory which the said canal shall traverse, or which shall be near the waters applicable thereto, in order to induce such states or governments to facilitate the construction of the said canal by every means in their power. And furthermore, the United States and Great Britain agree to use their good offices, wherever or however it may be most expedient, in order to procure the establishment of two free ports, one at each end of the said canal.

ARTICLE 5.

The contracting parties further engage that, when the said canal shall have been completed, they will protect it from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation, and that they will guarantee the neutrality thereof, so that the said canal may forever be open and free, and the capital invested therein secure. Nevertheless, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, in according their protection to the construction of the said canal, and guaranteeing its neutrality and security when completed, always understand that this protection and guarantee are granted conditionally, and may be withdrawn by both Governments or either Government, if both Governments, or either Government, should deem that the persons or company undertaking or managing the same adopt or establish such regulations concerning the traffic thereupon as are contrary to the spirit and intention of this convention, either by making unfair discriminations in favor of the commerce of one of the contracting parties over the commerce of the other, or by imposing oppressive exactions or unreasonable tolls upon the passengers, vessels, goods, wares, merchandise, or other articles. Neither party, however, shall withdraw the aforesaid protection and guarantee without first giving six months' notice to the other.

ARTICLE 6.

The contracting parties in this convention engage to invite every state with which both or either have friendly intercourse to enter into stipulations with them similar to those which they have entered into with each other, to the end that all other states may share in the honor and advantage of having contributed to a work of such general interest and importance as the canal herein contemplated. And the contracting parties likewise agree that each shall enter into treaty stipulations with such of the Central American States as they may deem advisable, for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of this convention, namely, that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same; and they also agree that the good offices of either shall be employed, when requested by the other, in aiding and assisting the negotiation of such treaty stipulations; and should any differences arise as to right or property over the territory through which the said canal shall pass between the States or Governments of Central America, and such differences should in any way impede or obstruct the execution of the said canal, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain will use their good offices to settle such differences in the manner best suited to promote the interests of the said canal and to strengthen the bonds of friendship and alliance which exist between the contracting parties.

ARTICLE 7.

It being desirable that no time should be unnecessarily lost in commencing and constructing the said canal, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain determine to give their support and encouragement to such persons or company as may first offer to commence the same, with the necessary capital, the consent of the local authorities, and on such principles as accord with the spirit and intention of this convention; and if any persons or company should already have, with any state through which the proposed ship canal may pass, a contract for the construction of such a canal as that specified in this convention, to the stipulations of which contract neither of the contracting parties in this convention have any just cause to object, and the said persons or company shall, moreover, have made preparations and expended time, money, and trouble on the faith of such contract, it is hereby agreed that such persons or company shall have a priority of claim over every other person, persons, or company to the protection of the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, and be allowed a year from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention for concluding their arrangements and presenting evidence of sufficient capital subscribed to accomplish the contemplated undertaking, it being understood that if, at the expiration of the aforesaid period, such persons or company be not able to commence and carry out the proposed enterprise, then the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall be free to afford their protection to any other persons or company that shall be prepared to commence and proceed with the construction of the canal in question.

ARTICLE 8.

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other state which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

ARTICLE 9.

The ratifications of this convention shall be exchanged at Washington within six months from this day, or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof we, the respective plenipotentiaries, have signed this convention and have hereunto affixed our seals.

Done at Washington the 19th day of April, A. D. 1850.

APPENDIX B.

HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY OF 1901.

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America,

And His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Honorable Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1.

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of April 19, 1850.

ARTICLE 2.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ARTICLE 3.

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed October 28, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay, in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

ARTICLE 4.

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the beforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

ARTICLE 5.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington the 18th day of November, A. D. 1901.

JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to say, in justice to the Senator from New York, because I did not want to keep him any longer on his feet than necessary, that my main object in asking him to yield—I had heard his speech—was in order to have the exact language of the Supreme Court go to the country in the speech he is making.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the hour is late, and I shall not resume any debate on this question. But I want to answer very briefly one of the arguments that was made, not so much by the Senator from New York as in a colloquy between the Senator from New York and the Senator from Iowa, as to whether or not under the treaty stipulation we would have the right to land and revictual our men-of-war, and so forth, in the canal.

I do not think that question has been fairly and squarely met and answered. If my construction of this treaty is right, if the construction is correct which was placed upon it by the Members of the Senate when they adopted it, and which was voiced in every argument that was uttered, then there is but one answer, "No; that can not be done."

There was one piece of mother earth, the canal and its zone, which should be free from war. It was neither a place where war could be conducted, nor a place where munitions of war could be landed, nor a place where the belligerents of either side, whether the United States or any other country, could take any part in a conflict. It was intended to be a zone of peace, which should be acknowledged by all the world as sacred ground.

I claim here that if we are not correct, then the theory stated by the Senator from New York, if I understood him correctly, is the proper one, viz, that if a German railway owned a ship we could discriminate against that ship because it was a railway-owned ship, and we could discriminate against a Canadian ship because it was a railway-owned ship.

If the construction as claimed by the Senator from New York is correct, then, if we should apply the same regulation to all railroad-owned ships, we undoubtedly would have that authority. But I ask, candidly, if any Senator believes that under the provisions of this treaty we could say to Great Britain or Germany or any other country: "If you have a ship that is owned by one of your railways we can discriminate against it and treat it differently than we would any other ship owned by a citizen of your country"? I do not believe it.

We ought to consider this treaty just as it is, Mr. President, and keep within its four corners in determining what it says. But in construing it, if it is open to doubt, we have a right to consider all of its history and all its surroundings at the time of its adoption, while keeping within the limits of its provision.

Let me ask Senators this question, after reading one section of the treaty:

The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised, nor any act of hostility be committed within it.

Does that apply to the United States? Does it mean that no acts of war can be committed within it except by the United States? Does it mean that it shall not be blockaded except by the United States? Or is the United States included in the inhibition? And if the United States is included within the inhibition of that section, it must be included also in every other section. That it is is clearly evident from what follows. Let me read it, then, including what follows:

The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

If the United States would have that authority anyway, if the United States would have unlimited authority over the canal as its own property, why was it necessary, after declaring that no acts of war or of hostility should be committed within it and that it should not be blockaded, to insert a provision, in order to take the United States especially without that restriction, that the United States should have liberty to do certain things that were consistent and proper and naturally followed ownership?

All of the argument that I have heard has been an argument against the propriety of ever having adopted a treaty of this character. That may have been proper argument at the time; but we did adopt the treaty, and we adopted it to get rid of another treaty which held us within certain limitations.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. Inasmuch as I take it the Senator from North Dakota is now really replying to suggestions of my own, I beg to submit to him this consideration: Undoubtedly the provision just read by the Senator from North Dakota does apply to or govern the United States, because it refers to a condition of the canal itself. It is a provision about the thing itself. It applies to the United States in just the same way as though it had been provided so that the locks in the canal should be not less than 110 feet wide. Of course, if such a provision had been put into the treaty, it would have bound everybody connected with it, because it controls the thing itself.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. FALL. In line with what the Senator has suggested in reference to the necessity for the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, I wish to suggest to him that at the time of the adoption of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty Great Britain was directly interested in Central America and near the Isthmus of Panama by the ownership of British Honduras and the Mosquito Coast, and at that time the United States had absolutely no interest there whatsoever; and even yet Great Britain retains a certain sovereignty over a portion of the Mosquito Coast.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Iowa if he believes this provision was intended to apply to the United States as well as to foreign countries:

No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

Is it the Senator's claim that the other provision which I read did include the United States, but this provision does not include it?

Mr. CUMMINS. In my opinion the provision just read by the Senator from North Dakota does not apply to the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, Mr. President, when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was signed does the Senator think, after reading the arguments and the diplomatic correspondence, that it was the intention of the two countries entering into that agreement that the United States should have the advantage of using it for war purposes, for blockading it against other countries, having her munitions of war there, and using it as a base for war supplies; and does the Senator believe that any other country which was interested in that canal would have signed an agreement that it was denied even the right to either blockade or the right to commit any acts of hostility within 3 marine leagues of the mouth of the canal at either end, and at the same time that the other belligerents should be allowed to use it for hostile purposes, without any ability to protect itself, and that such other country should even go to the extent of binding itself not to take any steps against it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I answer that by saying that undoubtedly other nations were willing to so agree. Undoubtedly Great Britain did so agree. The United States bought this tract of land 10 miles wide and paid for it with its own money. It was to build the canal. I can not believe it was in thought then that the United States should have no right whatsoever in this canal not enjoyed by all the other nations of the world.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. In just one moment. The Senator differs entirely with Senator Davis when he presented the report and with his argument when he declared most emphatically that that was our contention; that we claimed no other or further right than that which was necessary to protect the canal itself; the fact of our investment of the money expended there was to be paid back to us in the tolls which should be charged and in the other benefits that we should derive from it was our recompense for the outlay, and that outside of those tolls and outside of those benefits we were to be placed exactly in the position of every other country in the world. That was the contention of Senator Davis when he presented the report. That was the argument that was made in support of the new treaty which should supersede the old one. I was in the Senate at that time and I do not remember of any Senator ever disagreeing with him upon that proposition.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no other information than is contained in the language of the treaty itself. If the purpose of the United States in executing this treaty was as just suggested by the Senator from North Dakota, that purpose was very inaptly and inefficiently expressed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. There is where we finally land. Instead of giving the fair construction which these words demand we fall back, in our argument every time, upon the proposition that we ought not to have made such an agreement. But, Mr. President, we did make such an agreement, and the agreement is as clearly expressed as the English language can make it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I can convince the Senator from North Dakota in a very little time that the treaty does not make the provision which he has just recited as being the views of the then Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Davis; but I will defer that until another day, when I shall hope to discuss somewhat historically the treaty before us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask the Senator this question: He states that he was a Member of the Senate when this treaty was adopted, and, as I understand him, maintains that the provisions of the treaty with reference to a maintenance of the neutrality of the canal binds this Government the same as all other governments. I want to ask him if at the time he voted for the treaty he contemplated this possible situation: A Japanese fleet at the western end of the canal aiming to pass through the canal and bombard New York? Did he contemplate the idea that we were building a highway through which they should pass to our principal city, and did he think at the time he voted for the treaty that we would be obliged to allow that fleet to pass through our canal unmolested, not to touch it or attempt to stop it until it was 3 marine leagues from the eastern end of the canal?

Mr. CUMMINS rose.

Mr. REED. I am addressing my question to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to supplement the question of the Senator from Missouri——

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. With the further suggestion that under the treaty, if it applies, we would be compelled to allow the supposed Japanese fleet to have 24 hours' start of any ship of our own that we might pass through the canal.

Mr. REED. And to victual and recoal on the way. Did the Senator from North Dakota contemplate a situation of that kind, and did the Senate of the United States contemplate it?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, when the treaty was adopted we had before us the rules and regulations concerning the Suez Canal. We adopted and embodied in the treaty practically the same rules. We adopted so far as they applied here the same rules with reference to the passage of ships through this canal. The Suez Canal is to-day held sacred by all nations against any acts of war. No acts of war are allowed within 3 leagues. If any war vessel passes through that canal, it must not delay, it must not revictual, or do anything on its voyage to help itself or injure its enemy; and it makes no difference though Great Britain holds the control of the canal and its stock; it binds her warships the same as it binds other warships in the matter of revictualing or committing any act of violence within a certain zone. That which has operated so successfully in the Old World will operate equally successfully on this side of the world.

I had not the least fear then and I have no fear now that the Japanese Government would violate the terms of this agreement, though made with another Government. If she did violate it, then, of course, we would be justified in protecting ourselves in times of war to meet whatever exigencies might arise and by whatever means that might be necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me a moment before he takes his seat. I heard a part of the Senator's speech in connection with what he was just saying. Did the Senator call the attention of the Senate to the fact that when the treaty was here in 1900 a provision was added by the Senate covering this subject, and the treaty was rejected by Great Britain and came back with just that one provision left in?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator discussed that?

Mr. McCUMBER. I had not discussed it, but I recall it very well.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is found on page 9.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent that the treaties which are found in the hearings conducted by the Panama Canal Committee on the Isthmus, as shown on pages 264 to 274 of the book which I send to the desk, may be printed in the RECORD. Those are the treaties about which the discussion centers, and I think that the public would be interested in seeing what they are.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Connecticut? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

GREAT BRITAIN—INTEROCEANIC SHIP CANAL.

CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN FOR FACILITATING AND PROTECTING THE CONSTRUCTION OF A SHIP CANAL BETWEEN THE ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC OCEANS, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES.

[Concluded Apr. 19, 1850; ratification advised by the Senate May 22, 1850; ratified by the President May 23, 1850; ratified by Her Britannic Majesty June 11, 1850; ratifications exchanged July 4, 1850; proclaimed July 5, 1850.]

By the President of the United States of America—A proclamation.

Whereas a convention between the United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty, for facilitating and protecting the construction of a ship canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and for other purposes, was concluded and signed at Washington on the 19th day of April last, which convention is, word for word, as follows:

CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND HER BRITANNIC MAJESTY.

The United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty, being desirous of consolidating the relations of amity which so happily subsist between them, by setting forth and fixing in a convention their views and intentions with reference to any means of communication by ship canal which may be constructed between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by the way of the River San Juan de Nicaragua, and either or both of the Lakes of Nicaragua or Managua, to any port or place on the Pacific Ocean; the President of the United States has conferred full powers on John M. Clayton, Secretary of State of the United States; and Her Britannic Majesty on the Right Hon. Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer, a member of Her Majesty's most honorable privy council, knight commander of the most honorable Order of the Bath, and envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Her Britannic Majesty to the United States, for the aforesaid purpose; and the said plenipotentiaries having exchanged their full powers, which were found to be in proper form, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE I. The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal; agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same, or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords, or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have, to or with any State or people, for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same; nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any State or Government through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other.

ART. II. Vessels of the United States or Great Britain traversing the said canal shall, in case of war between the contracting parties, be exempted from blockade, detention, or capture by either of the belligerents; and this provision shall extend to such a distance from the two ends of the said canal as may hereafter be found expedient to establish.

ART. III. In order to secure the construction of the said canal, the contracting parties engage that if any such canal shall be undertaken upon fair and equitable terms by any parties having the authority of the local government or governments through whose territory the same may pass, then the persons employed in making the said canal, and their property used, or to be used, for that object, shall be protected, from the commencement of the said canal to its completion, by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, from unjust detention, confiscation, seizure, or any violence whatsoever.

ART. IV. The contracting parties will use whatever influence they respectively exercise, with any State, States, or Governments possessing or claiming to possess any jurisdiction or right over the territory which the said canal shall traverse, or which shall be near the waters applicable thereto, in order to induce such States or Governments to facilitate the construction of the said canal by every means in their power. And furthermore, the United States and Great Britain agree to use their good offices, wherever or however it may be most expedient, in order to procure the establishment of two free ports, one at each end of the said canal.

ART. V. The contracting parties further engage, that when the said canal shall have been completed, they will protect it from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation, and that they will guarantee the neutrality thereof, so that the said canal may forever be open and free, and the capital invested therein secure. Nevertheless, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, in according their protection to the construction of the said canal, and guaranteeing its neutrality and security when completed, always understand that this protection and guarantee are granted conditionally, and may be withdrawn by both Governments, or either Government, if both Governments, or either Government should deem that the persons or company undertaking or managing the same adopt or establish such regulations concerning the traffic thereupon as are contrary to the spirit and intention of this convention, either by making unfair discriminations in favor of the commerce of one of the contracting parties over the commerce of the other, or by imposing oppressive exactions or unreasonable tolls upon passengers, vessels, goods, wares, merchandise, or other articles. Neither party, however, shall withdraw the aforesaid protection and guarantee without first giving six months' notice to the other.

ART. VI. The contracting parties in this convention engage to invite every State, with which both or either have friendly intercourse, to enter into stipulations with them similar to those which they have entered into with each other, to the end that all other States may share in the honor and advantage of having contributed to a work of such general interest and importance as the canal herein contemplated. And the contracting parties likewise agree that each shall enter into treaty stipulations with such of the Central American States as they may deem advisable, for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of this convention, namely, that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same; and they also agree that the good offices of either shall be employed, when requested by the other, in aiding and assisting the negotiation of such treaty stipulations; and should any differences arise as to right or property over the territory through which the said canal shall pass between the States or Governments of Central America, and such differences should in any way impede or obstruct the execution of the said canal, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain will use their good offices to settle such differences in the manner best suited to promote the interests of the said canal and to strengthen the bonds of friendship and alliance which exist between the contracting parties.

ART. VII. It being desirable that no time should be unnecessarily lost in commencing and constructing the said canal, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain determine to give their support and encouragement to such persons or company as may first offer to commence the same, with the necessary capital, the consent of the local authorities, and on such principles as accord with the spirit and intention of this convention; and if any persons or company should already have, with any State through which the proposed ship canal may pass, a contract for the construction of such a canal as that specified in this convention, to the stipulations of which contract neither of the contracting parties in this convention have any just cause to object; and the said persons or company shall, moreover, have made preparations, and expended time, money, and trouble, on the faith of such contract, it is hereby agreed that such persons or company shall have a priority of claim, over every other person, persons, or company, to the protection of the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, and be allowed a year, from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, for concluding their arrangements, and presenting evidence of sufficient capital subscribed to accomplish the contemplated undertaking; it being understood that if, at the expiration of the aforesaid period, such persons or company be not able to commence and carry out the proposed enterprise, then the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall be free to afford their protection to any other persons or company that shall be prepared to commence and proceed with the construction of the canal in question.

ART. VIII. The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America; and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

ART. IX. The ratifications of this convention shall be exchanged at Washington within six months from this day, or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof, we, the respective plenipotentiaries, have signed this convention, and have hereunto affixed our seals.

Done at Washington, the 19th day of April, A. D. 1850.

[L. S.] JOHN M. CLAYTON.
[L. S.] HENRY LYTTON BULWER.

And whereas the said convention has been duly ratified on both parts, and the respective ratifications of the same were exchanged at Washington, on the 4th instant, by John M. Clayton, Secretary of State of the United States, and the Right Hon. Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Her Britannic Majesty, on the part of their respective Governments:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Zachary Taylor, President of the United States of America, have caused the said convention to be made public, to the end that the same, and every clause and article thereof, may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 5th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1850 and of the independence of the United States the seventy-fifth.

GREAT BRITAIN—INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN TO FACILITATE THE CONSTRUCTION OF A SHIP CANAL.

[Signed at Washington, November 18, 1901; ratification advised by the Senate, December 16, 1901; ratified by the President, December 26, 1901; ratified by Great Britain, January 20, 1902; ratifications exchanged at Washington, February 21, 1902; proclaimed, February 22, 1902.]

By the President of the United States of America—A proclamation.

Whereas a convention between the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in Article VIII of that convention, was concluded and signed by their respective plenipotentiaries at the city of Washington on the 18th day of November, 1901, the original of which convention is word for word as follows:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British dominions beyond the seas, King and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in Article VIII of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British dominions beyond the seas, King and Emperor of India, the Right Honorable Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I. The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ART. II. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ART. III. The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war as in time of peace shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

ART. IV. It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

ART. V. The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and thereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, A. D. 1901.

[SEAL.] JOHN HAY.
[SEAL.] PAUNCEFOTE.

And whereas the said convention has been duly ratified on both parts, and the ratification of the two Governments were exchanged in the city of Washington on the 21st day of February, 1902:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, have caused the said convention to be made public, to the end that the same and every article and clause thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 22d day of February, A. D. 1902, and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and twenty-sixth.

PANAMA—SHIP CANAL.

CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE REPUBLIC OF PANAMA FOR THE CONSTRUCTION OF A SHIP CANAL TO CONNECT THE WATERS OF THE ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC OCEANS.

[Signed at Washington, November 18, 1903; ratification advised by the Senate, February 23, 1904; ratified by the President, February 25, 1904; ratified by Panama, December 2, 1903; ratifications exchanged at Washington, February 26, 1904; proclaimed, February 26, 1904.]

By the President of the United States of America—A proclamation.

Whereas a convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama to insure the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus of Panama to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans was concluded and signed by their respective plenipotentiaries at Washington on the 18th day of November, 1903, the original of which convention, being in the English language, is word for word as follows:

ISTHMIAN CANAL CONVENTION.

The United States of America and the Republic of Panama being desirous to insure the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus of Panama to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and the Congress of the United States of America having passed an act approved June 28, 1902, in furtherance of that object, by which the President of the United States is authorized to acquire within a reasonable time the control of the necessary territory of the Republic of Colombia, and the sovereignty of such territory being actually vested in the Republic of Panama, the high contracting parties have resolved for that purpose to conclude a convention and have accordingly appointed as their plenipotentiaries—

The President of the United States of America, John Hay, Secretary of State, and

The Government of the Republic of Panama, Philippe Bunau-Varilla, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Republic of Panama, thereunto specially empowered by said Government, who after communicating with each other their respective full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE I. The United States guarantees and will maintain the independence of the Republic of Panama.

ART. II. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal of the width of 10 miles, extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal to be constructed; the said zone beginning in the Caribbean Sea 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark and extending to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to a distance of 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark, with the proviso that the cities of Panama and Colon and the harbors adjacent to said cities, which are included within the boundaries of the the zone above described, shall not be included within this grant. The Republic of Panama further grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of any other lands and waters outside of the zone above described which may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal or of any auxiliary canals or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said enterprise.

The Republic of Panama further grants in like manner to the United States in perpetuity all islands within the limits of the zone above described, and in addition thereto the group of small islands in the Bay of Panama, named Perico, Naos, Culebra, and Flamenco.

ART. III. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in Article II of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said Article II which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located, to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority

ART. IV. As rights subsidiary to the above grants the Republic of Panama grants in perpetuity to the United States the right to use the rivers, streams, lakes, and other bodies of water within its limits for navigation, the supply of water or water power or other purposes, so far as the use of said rivers, streams, lakes, and bodies of water and the waters thereof may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal.

ART. V. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity a monopoly for the construction, maintenance, and operation of any system of communication by means of canal or railroad across its territory between the Caribbean Sea and the Pacific Ocean.

ART. VI. The grants herein contained shall in no manner invalidate the titles or rights of private-land holders or owners of private property in the said zone or in or to any of the lands or waters granted to the United States by the provisions of any article of this treaty, nor shall they interfere with the rights of way over the public roads passing through the said zone or over any of the said lands or waters unless said rights of way or private rights shall conflict with rights herein granted to the United States, in which case the rights of the United States shall be superior. All damages caused to the owners of private lands or private property of any kind by reason of the grants contained in this treaty or by reason of the operations of the United States, its agents or employees, or by reason of the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal or of the works of sanitation and protection herein provided for, shall be appraised and settled by a joint commission appointed by the Governments of the United States and the Republic of Panama, whose decisions as to such damages shall be final and whose awards as to such damages shall be paid solely by the United States. No part of the work on said canal or the Panama Railroad or on any auxiliary works relating thereto and authorized by the terms of this treaty shall be prevented, delayed, or impeded by or pending such proceedings to ascertain such damages. The appraisal of said private lands and private property and the assessment of damages to them shall be based upon their value before the date of this convention.

ART. VII. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States within the limits of the cities of Panama and Colon and their adjacent harbors and within the territory adjacent thereto the right to acquire by purchase or by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, any lands, buildings, water rights, or other properties necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, and protection of the canal and of any works of sanitation, such as the collection and disposition of sewage and the distribution of water in the said cities of Panama and Colon, which, in the discretion of the United States, may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal and railroad. All such works of sanitation, collection, and disposition of sewage and distribution of water in the cities of Panama and Colon shall be made at the expense of the United States, and the Government of the United States, its agents or nominee, shall be authorized to impose and collect water rates and sewerage rates which shall be sufficient to provide for the payment of interest and the amortization of the principal of the cost of said works within a period of 50 years, and upon the expiration of said term of 50 years the system of sewers and waterworks shall revert to and become the properties of the cities of Panama and Colon, respectively, and the use of the water shall be free to the inhabitants of Panama and Colon, except to the extent that water rates may be necessary for the operation and maintenance of said system of sewers and water.

The Republic of Panama agrees that the cities of Panama and Colon shall comply in perpetuity with the sanitary ordinances, whether of a preventive or curative character, prescribed by the United States, and in case the Government of Panama is unable or fails in its duty to enforce this compliance by the cities of Panama and Colon with the sanitary ordinances of the United States, the Republic of Panama grants to the United States the right and authority to enforce the same.

The same right and authority are granted to the United States for the maintenance of public order in the cities of Panama and Colon and the territories and harbors adjacent thereto in case the Republic of Panama should not be, in the judgment of the United States, able to maintain such order.

ART. VIII. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all rights which it now has or hereafter may acquire to the property of the New Panama Canal Co. and the Panama Railroad Co. as a result of the transfer of sovereignty from the Republic of Colombia to the Republic of Panama over the Isthmus of Panama and authorizes the New Panama Canal Co. to sell and transfer to the United States its rights, privileges, properties, and concessions as well as the Panama Railroad and all the shares or part of the shares of that company; but the public lands situated outside of the zone described in Article II of this treaty now included in the concessions to both said enterprises and not required in the construction or operation of the canal shall revert to the Republic of Panama except any property now owned by or in the possession of said companies within Panama or Colon or the ports or terminals thereof.

ART. IX. The United States agrees that the ports at either entrance of the canal and the waters thereof, and the Republic of Panama agrees that the towns of Panama and Colon shall be free for all time so that there shall not be imposed or collected customhouse tolls, tonnage, anchorage, lighthouse, wharf, pilot, or quarantine dues or any other charges or taxes of any kind upon any vessel using or passing through the canal or belonging to or employed by the United States, directly or indirectly, in connection with the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the main canal, or auxiliary works, or upon the cargo, officers, crew, or passengers of any such vessels, except such tolls and charges as may be imposed by the United States for the use of the canal and other works, and except tolls and charges imposed by the Republic of Panama upon merchandise destined to be introduced for the consumption of the rest of the Republic of Panama, and upon vessels touching at the ports of Colon and Panama and which do not cross the canal.

The Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to establish in such ports and in the towns of Panama and Colon such houses and guards as it may deem necessary to collect duties on importations destined to other portions of Panama and to prevent contraband trade. The United States shall have the right to make use of the towns and harbors of Panama and Colon as places of anchorage, and for making repairs, for loading, unloading, depositing, or transshipping cargoes either in transit or destined for the service of the canal and for other works pertaining to the canal.

ART. X. The Republic of Panama agrees that there shall not be imposed any taxes, national, municipal, departmental, or of any other class, upon the canal, the railways and auxiliary works, tugs and other vessels employed in the service of the canal, storehouses, workshops, offices, quarters for laborers, factories of all kinds, warehouses, wharves, machinery and other works, property, and effects appertaining to the canal or railroad and auxiliary works, or their officers or employees, situated within the cities of Panama and Colon, and that there shall not be imposed contributions or charges of a personal character of any kind upon officers, employees, laborers, and other individuals in the service of the canal and railroad and auxiliary works.

ART. XI. The United States agrees that the official dispatches of the Government of the Republic of Panama shall be transmitted over any telegraph and telephone lines established for canal purposes and used for public and private business at rates not higher than those required from officials in the service of the United States.

ART. XII. The Government of the Republic of Panama shall permit the immigration and free access to the lands and workshops of the canal and its auxiliary works of all employees and workmen of whatever nationality under contract to work upon or seeking employment upon or in any wise connected with the said canal and its auxiliary works, with their respective families, and all such persons shall be free and exempt from the military service of the Republic of Panama.

ART. XIII. The United States may import at any time into the said zone and auxiliary lands, free of custom duties, imposts, taxes, or other charges, and without any restrictions, any and all vessels, dredges, engines, cars, machinery, tools, explosives, materials, supplies, and other articles necessary and convenient in the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the canal and auxiliary works, and all provisions, medicines, clothing, supplies, and other things necessary and convenient for the officers, employees, workmen, and laborers in the service and employ of the United States and for their families. If any such articles are disposed of for use outside of the zone, and auxiliary lands granted to the United States and within the territory of the Republic, they shall be subject to the same import or other duties as like articles imported under the laws of the Republic of Panama.

ART. XIV. As the price or compensation for the rights, powers, and privileges granted in this convention by the Republic of Panama to the United States, the Government of the United States agrees to pay to the Republic of Panama the sum of ten million dollars ($10,000,000) in gold coin of the United States on the exchange of the ratification of this convention and also an annual payment during the life of this convention of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars ($250,000) in like gold coin, beginning nine years after the date aforesaid.

The provisions of this article shall be in addition to all other benefits assured to the Republic of Panama under this convention.

But no delay or difference of opinion under this article or any other provisions of this treaty shall affect or interrupt the full operation and effect of this convention in all other respects.

ART. XV. The joint commission referred to in Article VI shall be established as follows:

The President of the United States shall nominate two persons and the President of the Republic of Panama shall nominate two persons and they shall proceed to a decision; but in case of disagreement of the commission (by reason of their being equally divided in conclusion) an umpire shall be appointed by the two Governments, who shall render the decision. In the event of the death, absence, or incapacity of a commissioner or umpire, or of his omitting, declining, or ceasing to act, his place shall be filled by the appointment of another person in the manner above indicated. All decisions by a majority of the commission or by the umpire shall be final.

ART. XVI. The two Governments shall make adequate provision by future agreement for the pursuit, capture, imprisonment, detention, and delivery within said zone and auxiliary lands to the authorities of the Republic of Panama of persons charged with the commitment of crimes, felonies, or misdemeanors without said zone and for the pursuit, capture, imprisonment, detention, and delivery without said zone to the authorities of the United States of persons charged with the commitment of crimes, felonies, and misdemeanors within said zone and auxiliary lands.

ART. XVII. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States the use of all the ports of the Republic open to commerce as places of refuge for any vessels employed in the canal enterprise, and for all vessels passing or bound to pass through the canal which may be in distress and be driven to seek refuge in said ports. Such vessels shall be exempt from anchorage and tonnage dues on the part of the Republic of Panama.

ART. XVIII. The canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by Section I of article 3 of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

ART. XIX. The Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels and its troops and munitions of war in such vessels at all times without paying charges of any kind. The exemption is to be extended to the auxiliary railway for the transportation of persons in the service of the Republic of Panama, or of the police force charged with the preservation of public order outside of said zone, as well as to their baggage, munitions of war and supplies.

ART. XX. If by virtue of any existing treaty in relation to the territory of the Isthmus of Panama, whereof the obligations shall descend or be assumed by the Republic of Panama, there may be any privilege or concession in favor of the Government or the citizens and subjects of a third power relative to an interoceanic means of communication which in any of its terms may be incompatible with the terms of the present convention, the Republic of Panama agrees to cancel or modify such treaty in due form, for which purpose it shall give to the said third power the requisite notification within the term of four months from the date of the present convention, and in case the existing treaty contains no clause permitting its modifications or annulment, the Republic of Panama agrees to procure its modification or annulment in such form that there shall not exist any conflict with the stipulations of the present convention.

ART. XXI. The rights and privileges granted by the Republic of Panama to the United States in the preceding articles are understood to be free of all anterior debts, liens, trusts, or liabilities, or concessions or privileges to other Governments, corporations, syndicates, or individuals, and consequently, if there should arise any claims on account of the present concessions and privileges or otherwise, the claimants shall resort to the Government of the Republic of Panama and not to the United States for any indemnity or compromise which may be required.

ART. XXII. The Republic of Panama renounces and grants to the United States the participation to which it might be entitled in the future earnings of the canal under Article XV of the concessionary contract with Lucien N. B. Wyse now owned by the New Panama Canal Co. and any and all other rights or claims of a pecuniary nature arising under or relating to said concession, or arising under or relating to the concessions to the Panama Railroad Co., or any extension or modification thereof; and it likewise renounces, confirms, and grants to the United States, now and hereafter, all the rights and property reserved in the said concessions which otherwise would belong to Panama at or before the expiration of the terms of 99 years of the concessions granted to or held by the above-mentioned party and companies, and all right, title, and interest which it now has or may hereafter have in and to the lands, canal, works, property, and rights held by the said companies under said concessions or otherwise and acquired or to be acquired by the United States from or through the New Panama Canal Co., including any property and rights which might or may in the future, either by lapse of time, forfeiture, or otherwise, revert to the Republic of Panama under any contracts or concessions, with said Wyse, the Universal Panama Canal Co., the Panama Railroad Co., and the New Panama Canal Co.

The aforesaid rights and property shall be and are free and released from any present or reversionary interest in or claims of Panama, and the title of the United States thereto upon consummation of the contemplated purchase by the United States from the New Panama Canal Co. shall be absolute, so far as concerns the Republic of Panama, excepting always the rights of the Republic specifically secured under this treaty.

ART. XXIII. If it should become necessary at any time to employ armed forces for the safety or protection of the canal, or of the ships that make use of the same, or the railways and auxiliary works, the United States shall have the right, at all times and in its discretion, to use its police and its land and naval forces or to establish fortifications for these purposes.

No change either in the Government or in the laws and treaties of the Republic of Panama shall, without the consent of the United States, affect any right of the United States under the present convention or under any treaty stipulation between the two countries that now exists or may hereafter exist touching the subject matter of this convention.

If the Republic of Panama shall hereafter enter as a constituent into any other Government or into any union or confederation of States, so as to merge her sovereignty or independence in such Government, union, or confederation, the rights of the United States under this convention shall not be in any respect lessened or impaired.

ART. XXV. For the better performance of the engagements of this convention and to the end of the efficient protection of the canal and the preservation of its neutrality, the Government of the Republic of Panama will sell or lease to the United States lands adequate and necessary for naval or coaling stations on the Pacific coast and on the western Caribbean coast of the Republic at certain points to be agreed upon with the President of the United States.

ART. XXVI. This convention, when signed by the plenipotentiaries of the contracting parties, shall be ratified by the respective Governments, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington at the earliest date possible.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention in duplicate and have hereunto affixed their respective seals.

Done at the city of Washington the 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1903.

[SEAL.] JOHN HAY.
[SEAL.] P. BUNAU VARILLA.

And whereas the said convention has been duly ratified on both parts and the ratifications of the two Governments were exchanged in the city of Washington on the 26th day of February, 1904:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, have caused the said convention to be made public, to the end that the same and every article and clause thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 26th day of February, in the year of our Lord 1904 and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and twenty-eighth.

[SEAL.] THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

By the President:
JOHN HAY, Secretary of State.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I move that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 18, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 17, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, upon the profound faith, hope, and love personified in Thy son Jesus Christ, who dignified and made sacred honest toil as the carpenter's son, spake as never man spake, lived like a king and died like a God, burst the bars of the tomb and exemplified the life and immortality of the soul, taught us the way, the truth, and the life, we base the longings, hopes, and aspirations of all that make life dear. And we most fervently pray that we may follow in our daily life His sublime example and prove ourselves worthy sons of our God and our Father. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CLARA DOUGHERTY, ETC.—DUPLICATE ENGROSSED BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 634.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to request the Senate to furnish the House of Representatives with a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 2748) for the relief of Clara Dougherty, Ernest Kubel, and Josephine Taylor, owners of lot No. 13; of Ernest Kubel, owner of lot No. 14; and of Mary Meder, owner of the south 17.10 feet front by the full depth thereof of lot No. 14, all of said property in square No. 724, in Washington, D. C., with regard to assessment and payment for damages on account of change of grade due to the construction of the Union Station, in said District; the original having been lost or mislaid.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

RADIO COMMUNICATION ON CERTAIN OCEAN STEAMERS.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the conference report on the bill (S. 3815) to amend an act entitled "An act to require apparatus and operators for radio communication on certain ocean steamers," approved June 24, 1910, be taken up and agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Of course everybody knows that this is Calendar Wednesday, and ordinarily the Chair would not entertain this proposition; but the Chair takes it that all the rules of the House are to be construed by the rules of common sense. The session is approximating its close, and these matters have to be considered. If there be no objection, this matter will be taken up now, and the Clerk will report it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I ask that the statement be read in lieu of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the statement will be read in lieu of the report.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (1007).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3815) to amend an act entitled "An act to require apparatus and operators for radio communication on certain ocean steamers," approved June 24, 1910, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following:

"That section 1 of an act entitled 'An act to require apparatus and operators for radio communication on certain ocean steamers,' approved June 24, 1910, be amended so that it will read as follows:

"'SECTION 1. That from and after October 1, 1912, it shall be unlawful for any steamer of the United States or of any foreign country navigating the ocean or the Great Lakes and licensed to carry, or carrying, 50 or more persons, including passengers or crew or both, to leave or attempt to leave any port of the United States unless such steamer shall be equipped with an efficient apparatus for radio communication, in good working order, capable of transmitting and receiving messages over a distance of at least 100 miles, day or night.

"'An auxiliary power supply, independent of the vessel's main electric power plant, must be provided which will enable the sending set for at least four hours to send messages over a distance of at least 100 miles, day or night, and efficient communication between the operator in the radio room and the bridge shall be maintained at all times.

"'The radio equipment must be in charge of two or more persons skilled in the use of such apparatus, one or the other of whom shall be on duty at all times while the vessel is being navigated. Such equipment, operators, the regulation of their watches, and the transmission and receipt of messages, except as may be regulated by law or international agreement, shall be under the control of the master, in the case of a vessel of the United States; and every willful failure on the part of the master to enforce at sea the provisions of this paragraph as to equipment, operators, and watches shall subject him to a penalty of $100.

"'That the provisions of this section shall not apply to steamers plying between ports or places less than 200 miles apart.'

"'SEC. 2. That this act, so far as it relates to the Great Lakes, shall take effect on and after April 1, 1913, and so far as it relates to ocean cargo steamers shall take effect on and after July 1, 1913: Provided, That on cargo steamers, in lieu of the second operator provided for in this act, there may be substituted a member of the crew or other person who shall be duly certified and entered in the ship's log as competent to receive and understand distress calls or other usual calls indicating danger, and to aid in maintaining a constant wireless watch so far as required for the safety of life.'"

And the House agree to the same.

JOSHUA W. ALEXANDER,
RUFUS HARDY,
W. E. HUMPHREY,
Managers on the part of the House.
WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
THEO. E. BURTON,
FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3815) to amend an act entitled "An act to require apparatus and operators for radio communication on certain ocean steamers," approved June 24, 1910, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

The conferees recommend that the Senate recede from its disagreement to the House amendment to the Senate bill 3815, and that the two Houses agree thereto with the following amendments:

As amended by the House, section 1 applies to steamers of the United States and of foreign countries licensed to carry 50 or more persons, including passengers or crew or both, the amendment makes the bill apply not only to vessels "licensed" to carry 50 or more persons, but to vessels "carrying 50 or more persons" as well.

The bill as amended by the House provides that steamers shall be equipped with an efficient apparatus for radio communication capable of transmitting and receiving messages over a distance of at least 100 miles, day or night, "under all conditions of atmospheric disturbance when it is safe for the operator to work the set."

The conferees agree that the language quoted may be stricken out of the bill wherever it appears.

The conferees agree that the following language shall be added at the end of section 1: "and efficient communication between the operator in the radio room and the bridge shall be maintained at all times."

The House amendment is further amended by providing that the section shall not apply to steamers plying between "places," as well as ports 200 miles apart.

Section 2 is amended by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That on cargo steamers, in lieu of the second operator provided for in this act, there may be substituted a member of the crew or other person who shall be duly certified and entered in the ship's log as competent to receive and understand distress calls or other usual calls indicating danger, and to aid in maintaining constant wireless watch so far as required for the safety of life.

Respectfully submitted.

JOSHUA W. ALEXANDER,
RUFUS HARDY,
W. E. HUMPHREY,
Conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] explain to the House the reasons for changing the language in reference to providing for efficient communication over a distance of at least 100 miles, day or night, under all conditions of atmospheric disturbance, and so forth? As I understand, the bill that passed the House provided that that should be done. Now that provision is stricken out.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The bill as it passed the House had this clause in it: That steamers "shall be equipped with an efficient apparatus for radio communication, in good working order, capable of transmitting and receiving messages over a distance of 100 miles, day or night, under all conditions of atmospheric disturbance, when it is safe for the operator to work the set."

Now, the language "under all conditions of atmospheric disturbance when it is safe for the operator to work the set" was stricken out on suggestion of the Senate conferees. After the bill passed the House I was advised that the language was so restrictive that there was only one concern in the United States that could probably furnish the apparatus, and it was to avoid such a result—that we might throw this industry into the hands of one company—that the conferees agreed that this language should be stricken out.

Mr. FOSTER. I appreciate the gentleman's idea of not wanting to give a monopoly to any one company. The question in my mind was whether striking out the language and putting in the other weakened the requirement.

Mr. MANN. Would not the language if left in be almost impossible to enforce in a criminal statute as a matter of certainty?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; and we wanted to avoid any possible monopoly. We do provide that the apparatus shall be efficient to send messages 100 miles day or night, and we thought that was description enough to insure efficient apparatus.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 17239. An act to authorize the Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River; and

H. R. 23515. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 6934. An act to provide an extension of time for submission of proof by homesteaders on the Uinta Indian Reservation;

S. 7002. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant to Salt Lake City, Utah, a right of way over certain public lands for reservoir purposes;

S. 6084. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5446. An act relating to partial assignments of desert-land entries within reclamation projects made since March 28, 1908;

S. 4745. An act to consolidate certain forest lands in the Paulina (Oreg.) National Forest; and

S. 338. An act authorizing the sale of certain lands in the Colville Indian Reservation in the town of Okanogan, State of Washington, for public-park purposes.

SENATE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill and joint resolutions of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 6176. An act for the relief of Gibbes Lykes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. J. Res. 122. Joint resolution providing for the payment of the expenses of the Senate in the impeachment trial of Robert W. Archbald; to the Committee on Appropriations.

S. J. Res. 119. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point John C. Scholtz, a citizen of Venezuela; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is the bill (H. R. 22913) to create a department of labor. The situation is this: After the motion for the engrossment and third reading of the bill was put, the gentleman from Illinois demanded the reading of the engrossed bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my demand for the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his demand for the reading of the engrossed bill, and the question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to take up the bill H. R. 21094, a bill to create a commission on industrial relations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to take up the bill H. R. 21094, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 21094. A bill to create a commission on industrial relations.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] will take the chair. [Applause.]

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SULZER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 21094, and the Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes to create a commission of nine persons, three of whom shall be employers of labor, three of whom shall be representatives of organized labor, and three from the citizenship at large, for the purpose of investigating industrial relationship existing between employer and employees throughout the country.

There has been a considerable spirit of unrest, not only in this country but all over the world, during the past two or three years. Out of that state of unrest has grown innumerable strikes and threats of strikes. Strikes between labor and capital are like wars between nations. They bring suffering, privation, hardships of every kind and character to those who are engaged in the disputes as well as to the community at large. Men do not engage in strikes purely for the amusement it brings them. Nor do they engage in strikes for what they consider frivolous reasons. Men who have gone through strikes know the hardships that are ahead of them, and consequently are not prone to engage in industrial contests unless they believe they have very important and serious grievances to correct which can not be corrected by other methods.

It follows, then, that with the large number of industrial disputes we have had in recent times growing out of this spirit of unrest that there must be in the minds of wageworkers in our country a feeling that injustice is being done them in some respects and under some circumstances and conditions.

The purpose of this measure is to provide a commission composed of equal numbers of wageworkers and employers, with a balance of disinterested parties, to conduct an investigation into the conditions which have created this spirit of unrest, and to report their findings from time to time to Congress so that it may legislate upon the subject if it deems it necessary or advisable so to do.

The bill provides an appropriation of a sum not to exceed $500,000 for the purpose of carrying on the work for three years' time, the commission expiring by limitation of the bill at the end of a period of three years. When the proper time arrives the committee will offer an amendment to that portion of the bill which it had previously amended, being section 5 as proposed, changing it to read as follows:

That the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the use of the commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913: Provided, That no portion of this money shall be paid except upon the order of said commission, signed by the chairman thereof.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman states that the committee proposes to offer an amendment appropriating $100,000 instead of $500,000. Is the gentleman of the opinion that this is all that will be required to make the investigation, or will the commission come back to Congress asking for another appropriation?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment it will require more than $100,000 to conduct this investigation, and the purpose of this amendment is to make the appropriation of $100,000 now for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913. Thereafter the appropriations will depend upon the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations and the House for the two fiscal years following that time.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it the intention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania or the committee, in providing for this commission, that they shall visit any other countries besides the United States?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The bill itself provides for an investigation into the methods of collective bargaining, and into any methods which have been tried in any State or any foreign country.

Mr. FOSTER. I notice that.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. And also—

For maintaining mutually satisfactory relations between employees and employers.

To the extent that it may be necessary to determine or examine into the methods that have been tried, the methods of collective bargaining which have been tried in foreign countries, the authority would be granted to proceed to foreign countries to make that investigation.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact that the bill gives the commission that power in section 2, in lines 18, 19, and 20—

And to authorize its members or its employees to travel in or outside the United States on the business of the commission.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is correct.

Mr. FOSTER. It also provides:

The commission is authorized as a whole, or by subcommittees of the commission duly appointed, to hold sittings and public hearings anywhere in the United States, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to compel testimony, etc.

In inquiring into the methods which have been tried in any State or foreign country for maintaining mutually satisfactory relations between employees and employers, and in providing that they may sit anywhere in the United States and "inquire into" these conditions, does the gentleman think the commission would have the right to visit foreign countries for that purpose?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The right to sit at any place and investigate carries with it the right to send for persons and papers. As a matter of fact, they could not send for persons and papers in a foreign country. They would have to depend upon the courtesies of the people of foreign countries for such information as they might be able to secure.

The commission, as was proposed in the original bill, was to be composed of two employees and two employers and five disinterested parties, making a commission of nine in that way. The committee, believing that it would facilitate the business of the commission to enable it to subdivide properly, proposed to change that and make the component parts of the commission three employers, three employees, and three disinterested parties, so that the commission might readily subdivide itself into three subcommittees and have a representative of each of those elements upon the subcommittee.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Will not the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] inquire whether this commission will be authorized to hold hearings in Europe?

Mr. FOSTER. The commission is empowered to inquire into certain methods in relation to employers and employees in foreign countries. What I was getting at was whether under that provision the commission has the right to visit foreign countries.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman will observe in lines 9 and 10, on page 2, that they are limited, so far as their sittings and public hearings are concerned, to the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. I read that to the gentleman from Pennsylvania first and then asked about the other.

Mr. COOPER. It says they inquire into——

Mr. FOSTER. I do not understand it gives them that right.

Mr. COOPER. Suppose they go to Europe.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will read lines 18, 19, and 20, on page 2, he will see that authority is given by the bill to members and the employees of the commission to travel in or outside of the United States on the business of the commission; and on page 3 it is provided that it may investigate into methods of collective bargaining; into any methods which have been tried in any State or in foreign countries for maintaining mutually satisfactory relations between employees and employers, so that the authority is given to travel in foreign countries. As a matter of fact, they could not send for persons and papers, but they would have to depend entirely upon the courtesy of those in foreign countries for such information as they might be able to gather there; but they are given permission to travel in those countries, so far as the courtesies of those countries will permit them to investigate.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me ask the gentleman this further question. I know from long experience in the mining industry the gentleman has a great deal of information concerning that great industry. Does the gentleman think that industry, which is important in this country—as this commission is to take up all the industrial conditions of the United States, does the gentleman think that this commission can give the necessary attention to the different problems connected with this industry?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The problem itself is an enormous problem, as everyone knows who has investigated the situation. It is a problem which reaches out into every walk of life. There is no situation in life that is not more or less affected by the industrial conditions and situation, so that the commission has an enormous task before it; but being in a position of dividing itself into subcommissions of three or even less if it so desires, each one of those subcommissions, having some of the component parts of the commission within itself, would be able to do as much on that line as three commissions ordinarily would do and then be able to bring the combined intelligence of all nine members of the commission to a solution of the problem involved after the information had been collected. Now, so far as the mining industry is concerned, which is a very large industry. At the present time, however, a great portion of that industry is being handled industrially through collective bargains. Very recently the anthracite region was included in the collective bargain arrangement, so that there is, I should judge, about 70 per cent of the mining operations in Pennsylvania—which produces half the coal produced in the United States—about 70 per cent of the mining operations in Pennsylvania that are covered by the collective bargain arrangement. The only portions that are not covered by the collective bargain arrangement are the Irwin field, the coke region, the Somerset County field of Pennsylvania. Those are the only ones not covered.

All of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Oklahoma, and all coal mines in Texas—lignite is not covered by it—Montana, Wyoming are covered by the collective-bargain arrangement, and part of West Virginia, part of Kentucky, part of Tennessee are not covered by the collective-bargain arrangement, so that the investigation of the problem, so far as the coal mining is concerned in the United States, the problem of collective bargaining, would not be a very large problem for investigation for a commission of this kind, a great bulk of the field being covered by mutual arrangement between employer and employees, in which collective bargaining is entered into; but the method by which these collective bargains are made, the extent to which they go, the effect which they have upon the industrial situation in the coal fields and the effect that industrial situation has upon the entire industrial situation would be matters within the scope of an investigation of this commission.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, is it the gentleman's opinion that this commission, composed of these Members, who are enabled under the provisions of this bill to divide themselves into subcommittees, will be able to go out and make as complete an investigation of this great industry of coal mining in all its different phases—not only coal mining, but quarrying and precious-metal mining and all matters connected with it—as they would under a commission which would give them jurisdiction only of this industry?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. As a matter of course, the more limited the field in which the commission operates the more fully the work of that commission can be done.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Why does the gentleman provide for dividing this committee into subcommittees? It strikes me a subcommittee of three employers in a certain field might render a report that would be unsatisfactory, just as a subcommittee of employees in a certain field might do.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It provides for a division into subcommittees of three. As the bill originally came to the committee it provided a commission composed of two employers, and two employees, and five disinterested parties. Now, it occurred to the committee that there being cause for this committee to appoint subcommittees, that it would be advisable to increase the number of employers and employees and reduce the number of disinterested parties, so that they would be equal, and it proposes an amendment making a commission composed of three employers, three employees, and three disinterested parties, so that if the commission when organized desires to divide itself into a committee of three there could be on that commission a representative of the employers, a representative of the employees, and a representative of the public at large.

Mr. COOPER. Yes; but if the gentleman will permit this suggestion, this law ought to be mandatory if those are to be subcommittees, that each subcommittee shall contain one member of each of these classes. Otherwise you may have three employers, or three employees, or three of the other class as a subcommittee sometimes.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I do not think that is within the possibilities with a commission composed as this commission is composed. And in addition to that, there may be instances, and undoubtedly will be, where a certain line of information is sought by the commission, where only one member of the commission would be necessary to go after that line of information.

Mr. COOPER. I was speaking simply of the matter of the public hearings in the United States. If a subcommittee is to have a public hearing, it ought not to be a subcommittee composed of three of one class.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Oh, that is true.

Mr. COOPER. And the law ought to be mandatory that it shall not consist of three of one class. But there is nothing in the bill as now presented which would prevent public hearings in the United States being held by a subcommittee composed of three of one class.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No; but it is not likely that a committee would be composed in that way.

Mr. COOPER. It is not likely, but it might occur.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It is practically impossible. It certainly is not probable that any subcommittee of this commission would be sent out to investigate any phase of the situation that would be composed entirely of one of the elements mentioned.

Mr. COOPER. But a subcommittee might be sent, and it is contemplated it shall be practically at the outset a subcommittee of three men, and it might be sent to investigate one of the most important subjects which they could consider under this bill, and yet the law leaves it so that two of one class with one of another might be on the subcommittee and one class be entirely unrepresented.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is absolutely true, so far as this bill is concerned.

Mr. COOPER. The law ought not to be drawn in that form. The law ought to be mandatory so as to preclude the possibility of a failure of each of those classes to be represented on each of those subcommittees which in the United States could hold a public hearing for the purpose of submitting evidence to the Congress of the United States. One of the subcommittees hearing this testimony would submit to the other six men its report. The other six men would not have seen the witnesses, and the confrontation of witnesses is of supreme importance always in determining the weight to be given to their testimony. Therefore, I think this law should be amended so as to require by mandatory provision that any subcommittee holding a public hearing in the United States under this law shall have on that subcommittee a representative of each class provided for in the law.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The only objection I would have to a proposition of that kind would be that it would prevent the commission from dividing itself into more than three. It prevents the sending of one or two of the members of the commission into some locality to secure certain lines of information that might not be affected by the fact that one or the other of the elements of the commission were not at the hearing.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] yield to his colleague [Mr. MOORE]?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the Bureau of Labor, as at present constituted, have its duties so defined as to cover the purposes stated in section 4?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I think not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman thinks the bureau is not sufficient to meet the purpose of this bill?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No. The bureau as at present defined is practically a statistical bureau. This does not propose to any great extent to deal with statistics, or in other words, it is not the primary purpose of this commission to collect statistics. The purpose of this commission is to get at the underlying causes of the discontent that exists throughout the country and which exists in other countries at the present time; to get at the underlying reasons for that discontent; and to investigate the methods by which employees and employers deal with each other, with a view to determining whether those methods have anything to do with that spirit of discontent; and, further, to endeavor to discover whether or not there is some better method of handling the relationship between the employer and the employee than those that exist at the present time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The purpose of my inquiry is to ascertain whether by this bill we are getting at any more direct method of improving labor conditions than already exists. The gentleman knows we have a Bureau of Labor, which he says does not cover the purposes set out in this bill. But the other day we considered a bill creating a department of labor and passed it this morning, and it was passed with a view to alleviating labor conditions. That bill creates certain offices in addition to those already constituted in the Bureau of Labor and the Department of Commerce and Labor. The question is whether by the passage of this bill we are not adding to the red tape of the Government and multiplying offices to such an extent that instead of helping labor we interfere with its progress.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. In my judgment you are getting away from the red tape. You are getting this proposition of the relationship between employer and employee placed in the hands of nine men whose sole duty it is to investigate that problem, and thereby get away from the red tape of a department and meet actual conditions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But in the passage of this bill, if the department of labor bill also is enacted into law, you will have created three separate agencies in the interest of labor for doing substantially the same thing.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Not the same thing, but doing different phases of the work—different parts of the work—and, by the way, I may add right here at this point that the fact of the matter is that labor, which is the basis of all the wealth of the country, the means by which the wealth of the country is made available for use, has not received the attention at the hands of Congress that other interests have received. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not have to argue that labor is the creator of all wealth. That is conceded by every one who thinks upon the subject at all. Labor does receive consideration at the hands of Congress. The conditions of labor, unquestionably, have been improved during recent years. Some gentlemen differ as to whether the improvement is due solely to the influence of labor organizations or whether it is due to other agencies; but we will concede that labor organizations do help to improve the wage standard and the conditions of living.

Some of us assert, however, that there are other considerations that also improve the conditions of labor. I would not have labor confused with regard to its rights. We have been laboring here for several weeks on bills that are termed "labor bills." If the average laboring man grasps the situation, very well; but it seems to me that we, as legislators, ought to make the course of labor as easy as possible, and we ought to pile up the least possible red tape for the confusion of labor.

Now, if the Bureau of Labor does not represent labor we ought to know that. We have a Bureau of Labor now at work. It has been investigating the conditions of labor for years and years. The gentleman has proposed a department of labor bill, which the House passed this morning. That makes a new agency through which labor is to be represented in all general affairs. Now, the purposes of the Bureau of Labor, apparently, are understood, and the purposes set forth in the bill creating the department of labor are understood, and labor does get its recognition. The gentleman now comes forward with a bill and proposes a commission which shall also do the work, apparently, that has been assigned to the Bureau of Labor and to the department of labor. If there is a new purpose in it, that is what I am trying to have the gentleman explain.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I have already stated that there is a new purpose in it, and I have stated that purpose as clearly as I can, and if the gentleman does not understand the purpose of this commission the fault lies either with my expression of that purpose or with the gentleman's misunderstanding of my language.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There can be no personal differences between the gentleman and myself, of course, because the gentleman is extremely intelligent upon this question of labor and of the rights of labor. Now, may I ask the gentleman this: Will this industrial commission, if created, have the power to put into effect any of the findings that may result from its work?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It will have no power to put any findings into effect. It will have the power to report to Congress what its conclusions are; and then, having reported to Congress what its conclusions are, Congress will determine whether or not it will take any action upon the matter.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, as in the case of the department of labor, the result of the work of the industrial commission will be to publish its views upon the investigations it has made.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The work of the commission itself will be to investigate those things that are specifically provided for in the measure. Having investigated them, then it will report to Congress its conclusions upon those investigations. It will then depend upon Congress to take such action as Congress may deem wise in the premises.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the industrial commission, as proposed, is merely to investigate and report its conclusions upon labor conditions.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is the purpose of it, to investigate into the relationship existing between employer and employee, and the effect that that relationship has upon the spirit of unrest which now exists and has existed for some time among the wageworkers; what the effect of that relationship has upon industry in general and upon the community at large, and the best things that can be devised by the employer and the employee to bring them into a relationship that is for the best interests of the community at large.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then effect can be given to the recommendations of the commission only by act of Congress?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is all. We do not propose to give any legislative power to the commission.

Mr. HOWARD. And can not.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There is no power in Congress, in my judgment, to give any legislative power to a commission.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Referring to the first section of the bill, which was the subject of the interrogation of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he can tell about how many workmen in the United States are organized into labor organizations?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Approximately 3,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is the total number of wage earners in the United States?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The toal number of wage earners in the United States is somewhere between 20,000,000 and 25,000,000, I should judge, at the present time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have heard it estimated at 30,000,000.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Thirty million would include not only wageworkers but farmers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course, I include agricultural laborers as wage earners. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] inquired as to the number of the members of the commission and also as to the possibility of a subdivision of the commission being prejudiced on one side or the other, holding meetings without the knowledge or presence of the entire commission. As the bill reads, it proposes that the commissioners shall be nine in number, three of whom shall be employers of labor, three of whom shall be representatives of labor organizations——

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The inference is, of course, that they are to be employees.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May we have it understood that that designation is general; that the expression "representatives of labor organizations" does not exclude those who are employees?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. "Representatives of organized labor," in the sense in which the expression is used, means that there shall be three men who are connected with trades-union movements, who are members of trades-unions, who are employees or the representatives of employees, just the same as an employer may either be the owner or the representative of the owner of a property. So this provides for representation on that commission from the organized expression of the wageworkers of the country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Carried out literally, it would mean that three members of the commission shall be actual employers of labor?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And three members in addition should be members of labor organizations?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That leaves three still to be appointed, and those three could be wage earners, representing the great mass of wage earners who are not organized in labor unions.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. They will be, directly or indirectly, employers or employees; there can be no getting away from that. They may be professional men or employers or employees directly. But, either directly or indirectly, every person in the country is an employer or an employee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are a number of labor organizations, and one or two of them represent the greater number of those who are organized. Suppose a dozen labor organizations should clamor for representation on this proportion of three members of the commission. Does the gentleman think that the bill would prejudice the rights of the representative of the minor labor organizations applying for that place?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Oh, that is a matter entirely within the judgment of the President and the Senate as to who are best qualified to carry on the work.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. One more question and I will not trouble the gentleman further. This bill proposes to spend $500,000 for the purpose of this industrial commission?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes; but there is a committee amendment which proposes to strike out $500,000 for the three years and making $100,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This bill will create a permanent commission?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No; it creates a commission whose term expires by limitation at the end of three years.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And it is proposed to spend $500,000 in the investigation which it will make.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It will require in the neighborhood of $500,000 to make the investigation as it should be made. It may not take that amount. Hence we propose to amend by making it $100,000 for the coming year, and then leave the matter for further appropriation by Congress, if it shall determine to do so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would be in addition to what Congress will spend for the Department of Commerce and Labor and for the Bureau of Labor?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Oh, yes; and it will be in addition to what we spend for the Army and the Navy and the State Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Upon what does the gentleman base his opinion that it will require $500,000 to make the investigation?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Because the subject matter is one of the greatest that has ever been investigated by any commission.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may be; but it does not explain the basis upon which the gentleman makes the estimate.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The immigration commission, as I understand it——

Mr. FITZGERALD. That money was wasted.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Cost more than $500,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; over $700,000, and not a thing of value resulted from the investigation. So far nothing of value has resulted from the Monetary Commission. I hazard the prediction that if you spend $500,000 on this commission the greater part of it will be wasted.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The subject matter is one in which everyone is interested.

Mr. FITZGERALD. True.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. And a complete investigation will place us where we can deal with the matter better than we can at the present time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman point out any power that Congress has to legislate on the matters?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Congress has not the power to legislate on all the matters.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then why investigate? If Congress has no power, why investigate?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Even if Congress had no power to legislate—and in many instances it has—there are many things in which this Government has been making and will continue to make investigations of value, for the information received can be made available for legislation by the various States, if not by the Federal Government. There are a number of things in which legislation can be made effective by the Federal Government—those relating to interstate commerce.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is what I ask the gentleman to point out.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The things affecting Federal employees and the things along that line are thoroughly within the scope of the Federal Government, and then the information which has been secured, if of value at all, will be available for every State in the Union in the enactment of its legislation.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman has just mentioned as a fact something which I think is not covered by the bill. That is what I want to ask him about. There is no provision in this bill requiring the commission to report anything but its findings and recommendations. There is no requirement here that the testimony shall be published and submitted to Congress.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There is no such requirement. If Congress desires that, it can at any time provide for it.

Mr. COOPER. I think that is of the utmost importance. The reports of the British commission and of various other commissions on industrial conditions, of our Monetary Commission on finance and currency, are of very great importance because accompanied by the testimony upon which their reports are based. My own judgment is that this law ought to require the printing of the testimony and its submission to the Congress.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to that if Congress wants to undertake the printing of the testimony as it is procured from time to time.

Mr. COOPER. It certainly ought to be printed.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. AYRES. I would like to ask the gentleman what, aside from the possible publishing of the testimony taken, this commission could do practically that is not already done by voluntary commissions like the National Civic Federation?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Oh, the scope of the National Civic Federation is not large enough. Its authority is not sufficient to enable it to go into this subject matter in a systematic way.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In the event that the bill to create a department of labor becomes a law at this session of Congress, does not the gentleman think the duties given in this bill to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor should be given to the secretary of labor? I refer to the duties prescribed in line 10 on page 1.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I think so; yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Ought not the bill to provide for that?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If the department of labor were now in existence, it should; but if we pass this with the Department of Commerce and Labor stricken out and the department of labor inserted, then, so far as the House is concerned, it would be dealing with a department that does not exist.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; but it could provide for the contingency that in the event there was a secretary of labor those duties could fall upon him.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That could be done, but it would be a very easy matter to remedy in the event the department of labor is created before the passage of this act.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But it would take additional legislation.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Undoubtedly it would. It is not a very important matter, however, it seems to me.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. HOBSON. I desire to ask a question bearing on the scope of the investigation. Much of the unrest that prevails in labor circles is due to the conditions—the actual physical conditions—of labor, particularly those bearing upon sanitation and the danger and exposure to life and limb. For a long time I have been hoping that the question of the loss of life and the injury to employees would be investigated.

I believe the investigation would bring results that are simply appalling. I want to ask the gentleman if under section 4 this commission would have authority to include in the scope of its investigation the conditions of sanitation, the exposure to life and limb, and the arrangement for compensation of employees?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Only in so far as those are incident to the unrest now existing. I want to say to the gentleman that in my judgment he is in error when he assumes that the low wages and the insanitary conditions and matters of that kind are the fundamental causes for a spirit of unrest. As a matter of fact, you find less unrest in those industries where the iron hand of the employer is used for the purpose of keeping the workman in low wages and in poor condition in order to keep them in subjection. The spirit of unrest does not get the opportunity to grow, and there is where there is more danger to our institutions than there is where higher pay exists and there is more unrest.

Mr. HOBSON. I will say to the gentleman I am in thorough accord with him that a condition of acceptance and acquiescence sometimes indicates a subjection that is most unhappy for the employee and for the community and for the people. In this country adequate provision has not been made thus far to protect the health and life and limb of the employee. An investigation of great value could be made that would not require much of the time of this commission, carried on in conjunction with the regular hearings.

A few additional questions asked would bring out the provisions that have been made and the lack of provision for preserving the health, life, and limb; and that additional information would be invaluable to this Congress and to all students of the problems of labor conditions——

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HOBSON. But I think it possibly well to have an amendment in order that it may not be excluded by an interpretation of authority. I believe the authority is perhaps in section 4, which provides for an inquiry into the general conditions of labor and the principal industries; but I would suggest, if the gentleman has no objection, where it speaks of the effect of industrial conditions on public welfare, and so forth, after the word "therewith," an amendment should be made adding, "to inquire into the conditions of sanitation and exposure of life and limb and the arrangement for compensation."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Well, so far as I am concerned, I see no objection to the amendment; but I can not speak for the committee.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman from Alabama familiar with the report of the commission recently appointed and recently reporting on the subject of compensation paid?

Mr. HOBSON. I know that part of the question of compensation is under investigation, but that is not an essential part, and I would be willing to leave that out if the gentleman thinks it is superfluous.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me, as we appointed a commission and they made a report and it is likely a bill will be passed when prepared—I hope there will be no excuse against that bill that we are now to make another investigation.

Mr. HOBSON. I will suggest to the gentleman that I will withdraw that part of my suggested amendment, leaving it simply when they are in their hearings that they shall have authority to call on witnesses to state what provisions have been made to protect the health and life and limb of the employees. When we reach that point I will offer that amendment.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Personally, I have no objection.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand the gentleman claims that the provisions of the bill are broad enough to go into the question of unrest. And, now, does the gentleman regard it as being broad enough to go into the causes of that unrest?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is what it is proposed to investigate, the causes of the unrest; that is the purpose of the commission; that is the primary purpose, to go into the causes of the state of unrest and find out, if possible, if there is any way by which the relationship between the employer and the employee can be brought to such a position that that spirit of unrest will not find the same kind of expression as it has found, and yet the welfare of both be protected and the welfare of the community at large be protected at the same time.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman regard the bill as being broad enough to take in the question of blacklisting?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Oh, yes; I think so.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman thinks he will have no trouble with that question without any amendment?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I do not think it will require any amendment. The commission will have power to investigate blacklisting as it affects the industrial situation.

Mr. SMALL. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman in his report on this bill uses this language:

> That there is widespread unrest among the wage workers of this country is apparent from the large number of trade disputes which have lately occurred or have lately been imminent.

The gentleman in his remarks has also referred to widespread dissatisfaction. Now, in response to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] the gentleman commented somewhat upon the causes of this unrest, and I would like to have the gentleman from his viewpoint state not only the causes but what is the desire on the part of labor as a remedy for this alleged dissatisfaction and unrest; to what extent higher wages are desired; to what extent the question of sanitation is desired; and in so far as the gentleman may summarize with the matter, to state what the remedies are, if afforded, that will allay this dissatisfaction and unrest to which the gentleman referred?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it is exactly the purpose of this commission to find out the causes of this unrest and to discover a remedy if possible.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I would suggest that it is rather an anomalous condition to inquire into causes of which we are ignorant and asking a remedy for thoses causes, the remedies for which are unknown. And I think it would be enlightening in this discussion if in voting on this bill to create this commission on industrial relations, we could have some concise explanation of the alleged causes for this alleged unrest and dissatisfaction and all the remedies which it is sought to be provided in order to allay them.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, there are many causes for the spirit of unrest. There is no one thing that is responsible, and it is the most difficult thing imaginable for any man to undertake to determine without a thorough investigation just the proportion of effect that one cause has and the proportion of effect that another cause has. The causes are so numerous, and there are some things that are considered causes that may not be causes and other things that may be causes that are not considered causes, that in the judgment of this committee it is deemed advisable to appoint a commission to investigate the entire subject matter, and after having determined what the causes are we will then be in a better position to determine the remedy that should be applied.

Mr. SMALL. May I interrupt the gentleman once more?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. SMALL. I had supposed that the chief causes of dissatisfaction, where they existed, were the low wages and the conditions of environment of labor at the place or in the industry in which it was engaged, but the gentleman awhile ago stated, as I understood him, that where labor receives its lowest wage—where it was under the iron hand of the employer—that there was less dissatisfaction and less disposition to assert their rights; and, on the contrary, I understood him to state that where wages were highest and conditions were best there was a greater condition of unrest and dissatisfaction. And I would like him to explain a little fuller the meaning of that statement which he made.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That statement is based upon human nature. We are all of us like Oliver Twist in that we are continually anxious to have more, and the man who is on the lower rung, who is working for the lowest wages, as a rule, is in such a position physically and mentally that he is not able to struggle for more as can the man who has raised a little higher than the other has.

And the man who is the mudsill, as we may say, is not physically or mentally in a position to struggle, as is the man who is better fed, better clothed, better read, for better conditions and shorter hours. So the actual facts are that in the great iron and steel industry, where the wages are low, and in many other of those industries where the wages are low, you do not find the same sort of unrest that you do in the higher skilled industries where the wages are higher than they are in the iron and steel industry, and where the men have greater ambition and greater desire for a betterment of their conditions than the ones who are lower paid. That is all there is to it. Simply a trait in human character that is found everywhere.

Mr. SMALL. Would it not be entirely consistent, then, if we are to appoint a committee to inquire into a condition that we do not know and the remedies for which we do not know? Would it not be consistent to enlarge this bill so as to include in it all ranks of life? Let us broaden it so as to include all the dissatisfied among all our population, whether employer or employee or idlers.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If the problem was a problem that seriously affected the State, then there would be wisdom in the gentleman's proposition, but the problems that this is proposed to deal with does seriously affect the State. It is a problem that affects the entire country—the problem of the relationship of our industries between employer and employee—and hence the desire to investigate into those conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have time in which to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended until he concludes his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NYE. Mr. Chairman, I was going to see if I could suggest a little help to the gentleman from Pennsylvania in answering the former question of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] in reference to the purpose of this bill. If the gentleman will permit me just two or three minutes—two minutes, perhaps—I want to give my idea of this whole subject: That information is the first essential to all advance in civilization; that communication between man and man is the path of civilization; that much of our trouble and unrest and discontent comes from the fact that man does not know his fellow man, and that the basic purpose of this bill in investigating in this country and in the world will have a marked tendency, and must have, to bring man closer to man, to establish a greater bond of humanity, and to deal with the vital industrial problems of this age. They are not only industrial, but they are also social, and they are political.

I am very happy to support this bill. I would like to see the workingmen's compensation bill passed first, but as I can not do that—it is hung up for some reason—let us pass this one now. I want both of them.

Mr. CANNON. Which is the bigger horse of the two?

Mr. MANN. Let us hear the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. NYE. I do not want to make a speech. I do not want to trespass upon the gentleman's time, but I will make a speech on the general questions of the day at any time.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to go further into the purposes and intents of this bill. In my judgment it will do considerable good. I have no idea that it will solve all the problems existing between employer and employee. Those I scarcely hope to see solved in my time; but I do believe that it will have a tendency toward the solution of those problems. It will have the tendency of bringing the employer and the employee together on common ground. My experience has been that when you are able to get the employer and the employee together on common ground, realizing that while their interests are not identical, they are mutual in seeing to it that the largest amount of production is secured with the least possible expenditure of labor, and that their interests diverge only when it comes to the point of determining the share that shall go to each in the common production—when, I say, you can get them together with that kind of a spirit—you have done considerable toward the solution of the problem. And this bill, if enacted into law, will tend to show the employer and the employee alike the necessity of getting together and thrashing out their differences over the table instead of in the industrial battlefield of strikes. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me just one question there at the end?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, to be of vital importance that the testimony which is taken by this commission or by any of its subcommittees at the public hearings in the United States shall be returned with the reports of the commission for the consideration of Congress.

Now, let me call the gentleman's attention to the language of this bill. The third section provides:

That said commission may report to the Congress its findings and recommendations from time to time.

Suppose there shall be a minority report and a majority report, what will Congress know concerning the facts upon which these reports are based unless it has also a record of the testimony?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I may say to the gentleman that I have no objection to any amendment that authorizes the publication of the hearings. I have no objection whatever to that.

Mr. COOPER. The last sentence in section 4 of the bill, page 3, is this:

The commission shall seek to discover the underlying causes of dissatisfaction in the industrial situation and report its conclusions thereon.

Suppose there is a majority report and a minority report. The House will know nothing about the testimony upon which this disagreement occurs. What decision can Congress render? What action can it take when confronted simply by a majority report and a minority report, both based upon evidence which Congress has not seen?

Mr. FITZGERALD. What provision is there in this bill for any minority report? The provision that the commission shall report its conclusions does not make very much room for a minority report.

Mr. COOPER. Has the gentleman from New York served in Congress so long and never heard of a majority and of a minority recommendation by different members of the same committee? This bill provides that the committee shall submit its findings and recommendations. The gentleman from New York anticipates perfect unanimity.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should hope there would be.

Mr. COOPER. But there may not be.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; there may not be.

Mr. COOPER. For instance, take the Ballinger investigation. When that was first proposed the resolution provided that there should be hearings before the committee or any subcommittee. The resolution was so drawn that these hearings might have been in secret. Then an amendment was carried to make all hearings public. Thereupon there were no subcommittee hearings, but hearings only by the full committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I scarcely think the gentleman's statement is parallel, because there has been no suggestion here that there should be any secret hearings.

Mr. COOPER. No; but I am only stating what occurs sometimes when such proceedings are not properly guarded. In the Ballinger investigation the whole committee heard each witness. Not only that, but the committee kept a record of the testimony, and that was printed and made available for Congress. But there was a majority and a minority report. Without a record of the evidence, what would Congress have known about the facts as presented by the witnesses, the majority of the committee of investigation having submitted a report with findings of fact and recommendations and a minority having done likewise?

Mr. FOSTER. Is it not usual that the evidence taken by these committees is printed, and that if the printing is not provided for in the bill Congress afterwards authorizes the printing of the testimony?

Mr. COOPER. There should be no delay in submitting the testimony to Congress. There is no reason why it can not be printed and submitted with each report. The committee will have the evidence and consider it for some time before making their report. The evidence could all be printed and accompany the report of the committee when that is presented.

Under the ordinary rule of statutory construction—that the mention of one thing is the exclusion of another—the committee would have a right to say that as by this bill they are expressly authorized to report their findings and recommendations, that therefore they are not authorized to report anything else. Certainly they ought to be required to submit the testimony with their report.

Mr. FOSTER. I fully agree with the gentleman that that ought to be done.

Mr. COOPER. Of course it ought to be done, and the law ought to be mandatory and be made so now.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose that would be done.

Mr. COOPER. The testimony will make a record of surpassing importance for the consideration not only of the people of this day but of future generations.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, of what value would that printed testimony be if the cause of unrest was due to some concrete proposition—that is to say, a question as to the raising or lowering of wages?

Mr. COOPER. The testimony would be before the committee and then submitted to the House, as to what are the wages, what are the different grades of workmen? What does each receive? What are the surroundings? Are there proper sanitary arrangements? Are wages paid weekly, semimonthly, or monthly? Do they make collective bargaining in that particular industry? All of these facts and a thousand others would be not only before the committee, but before the House, and they most assuredly ought to be before the body which is to judge upon the merits of the recommendations made by the commission. I sincerely hope that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] will consent to an amendment instructing the committee to report the testimony with its report.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. As I said before, I have no personal objection to an amendment which will make it clear. The judgment of the committee was that that power existed anyway under the bill, but I have no objection to an amendment which will make it clear.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the gentleman think this testimony ought to be reported from time to time? Of course at the end of the term of the commission the testimony would be available, but it ought to be published from time to time, because they are authorized to report from time to time.

Mr. COOPER. I think so, most assuredly. I shall support the bill with great pleasure, because I deem its enactment into law to be of the utmost importance.

The questions to be considered by the commission go to the very fundamentals of society to-day. There is unrest here, and there is unrest in free-trade England, a fact demonstrating that the tariff question is not the only one involved. No; the tariff question does not cover it. There is unrest everywhere in the industrial world. We have been merely skimming the surface in our attempts to find a remedy. No question can be satisfactorily solved until the truth is known to those who are called upon to solve it. What are the facts and all of the facts that constitute the great industrial problems? These must be made known that we may do industrial justice. Therefore, of course, the testimony ought to be printed. One of the greatest curatives of evils—political, social, or industrial—is publicity. This testimony ought to be promptly published, and be as open as the day. Public opinion will correct evils and allay the unrest when the facts are made known, and they ought to be made known as soon as they are found.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the question of printing, I beg to suggest that there is no provision in the bill authorizing the commission to have printing done. It is quite necessary for any body of nine men who consider any testimony or information presented to it to have the power to have that printing done as it goes along. I had proposed to offer an amendment to the amendment in the bill on page 2. The amendment to the bill reads:

And to rent such offices, to purchase such books, stationery, and other supplies as may be necessary to carry out the purposes for which such commission is created.

I had proposed to offer an amendment by inserting these words "and to have such printing and binding done," so that it would read:

And to rent such offices, to purchase such books, stationery, and other supplies, and to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary to carry out the purposes for which such commission is created.

I consider that that is quite necessary unless it should be understood as authorized by the bill without that, and I fear it would not be so understood.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the amendment which the gentleman proposes authorize them to report the testimony from day to day?

Mr. MANN. In a moment I will reach that.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will pardon me, I want to say that I believe that authority ought to be given to the commission to print, but we supposed that we were giving that authority when we provided that it should have authority to rent offices, purchase books, stationery, supplies, and so forth, to carry out its purposes.

Mr. MANN. The purchase of supplies, I fear, would not be held to be authority to have printing and binding done.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. MANN. I do not regard it material one way or the other whether a commission of this sort which takes testimony reports that testimony to Congress or not, because if the testimony is in print the usual custom for years in Congress has been to pass a resolution for the printing of a certain number of copies. That would be required in any case, because if they were required to report the testimony to Congress and it was ordered printed, it would only carry what we call the usual number, which does not amount to as much as one copy for each Member.

Mr. KENDALL. What amount is that?

Mr. MANN. Fourteen hundred copies—300 copies for the use of the House, a number for the Senate, a number for the executive departments, a number for the depositaries of the Government. We had an example of this with reference to the Industrial Commission, the Monetary Commission, and the Immigration Commission, and various other commissions on this subject. The Industrial Commission a few years ago took—I forget how many volumes of testimony, but it was quite a library.

Mr. FOSTER. Nineteen volumes.

Mr. MANN. The Monetary Commission has published a large library, and the immigration report is quite a library. The gentleman from Wisconsin truly states that Congress and the world would not be satisfied with merely having before it conclusions reached by a commission. What they want in addition is the evidence taken by that commission. I take it that this commission will do very much the same thing that the Monetary Commission did. It will have some one investigate the subject of legislation and the relations between capital and labor in New Zealand, for instance, and write a full and complete report on that subject for the use of the commission. The same would be probably true of other countries of the world. I do not understand from this bill that the intention is that which seems to be understood by some gentlemen of the House, that the purpose of the commission is to settle or report conclusions upon everything growing out of the relations between capital and labor in the various industries.

I think the origin of this proposition is somewhat like this: There have been many efforts made, not only in this country but in other parts of the world, to reach some method of trying to avoid strikes and lockouts. In some places there is compulsory arbitration, and in some places there is no control over the subject whatever, and no one undertakes to interfere in the dispute between the employer and the employee. The consensus of opinion of the civilized world is that if there be any method which can be reached by which the employer and the employee may be brought together and thus prevent a lockout or a strike, some such method ought to be pursued. In our country I believe no one at present would be in favor of compulsory arbitration.

We had pending before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce a bill which was reported to this House at two different Congresses, originally prepared, I think, by Charles Francis Adams, proposing that the President of the United States might appoint arbitrators—though I do not remember that the term was arbitrators, and I think it was not—in case of a dispute or threatened dispute between the employer and the employee.

That bill went through the committee and was reported to the House once while I was chairman of the committee, and once before I was chairman of the committee the purpose being in reporting it—and that was the understanding—that the bill would not be called up for passage, but that it was done to try to concentrate the attention of the country on the subject, to see whether everybody would agree upon some method of trying to avoid these industrial disputes or strikes and lockouts. Of course there is no way of avoiding disputes. Organized labor at that time and organized capital, I think, were both opposed to that bill, each being afraid that the other was in favor of it. That has been the trouble in the past. Capital, employers, have favored some proposition and labor would be opposed to it, because they thought there was something hidden in it, and if labor proposed something capital was opposed to it because it thought some undue advantage might be taken of it.

If I understand the purpose of this bill, it is that this commission after searching the world will endeavor to see whether capital and labor can agree on some method by which somebody is officially authorized to butt in in case of a strike or lockout, or threatened strike or lockout, and see if there is any way of bringing the people together by mediation or by agreement.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Or if there is any other way that is better.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania and I and everybody else will agree that there is no other way of doing it. No one in this House would favor compulsory arbitration, and the majority of the House are not in favor of letting go on forever the disputes between the employer and the employee, with no effort to prevent their terminating in a strike or lockout, with riot and bloodshed. If a commission can be appointed which can suggest to Congress conclusions or an opinion which will warrant Congress in drawing conclusions which will authorize somebody to tender their good offices or in any way seek to bring together the employer and the employee and see if there is a common ground upon which they can stand, certainly that commission will have accomplished a great purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I think we have the time, although I hope there will be some other labor bills called up and passed to-day, to listen for a time to the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. NYE. I am very anxious to have the gentleman address the House on this general subject, and I hope he will be recognized for that purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. NYE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is very kind of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and of you to permit general observations at this time, not altogether germane, perhaps, to this bill, but in a way related to it. I have not often asked the attention of the House, and it is quite possible that I shall not in the future even at all. I am in grave doubt whether my services in the House will be long continued. If they are not, of course it will be a great detriment to the country. [Applause.] But whether I retire early or late, I shall ever prize my membership in this House. The friendship and kindly personal relations I have with Members on both sides of the House will be always gratefully remembered.

I had in mind to make some general observations to-day upon the subject of progress. They are not in any sense personal. I am not going to undertake to advise any man that he shall vote for this man or that man, for this party or that party, but I desire to touch upon some fundamentals which in my mind are to be considered in connection with this great subject of progress. The wise man of old said, "Where there is no vision the people perish." Progress, to my mind, is the recognition of truth and fidelity to truth. It is the vision and obedience to the vision. Civilization has advanced because of great leadership.

Nations of the past have gone down because they forsook the teachings of their great leaders. Inspiration is the light of history. Here and there along the centuries some great self-denying teacher and martyr has illumined the pathway of his fellow men. Moses, who chose rather to suffer affliction with his people than enjoy the luxury of an Egyptian court, was a leader and lawgiver, and to be such he must communicate with the source of all intelligence, of all law, and of all truth, and he must stay in the mountain until he was so imbued with the truth that he could come down and give the law on tables of stone to a benighted, restless, and discontented race. Progress is essentially the work of the individual, and I notice the first and most important thing is self-denial. Man progresses as he learns to overcome, and his individual victory over self is a prophecy of social advancement and of collective progress. I walk past the humble statue of Benjamin Franklin on Pennsylvania Avenue every morning, and I see on the four plain sides of the pedestal four words, "Printer, Patriot, Philanthropist Philosopher," and it has occurred to me that the foundation of the man's greatness was the printer—the useful man, the man who had learned a calling which was useful and industrial. This usefulness and thoroughness in a trade furnished the foundation of his illustrious life and achievements.

It was because of Franklin the printer, Franklin the boy of hardship and poverty, who wrought out of his own mind and soul the possibilities of greatness, that he was able as a philosopher to coax the lightning from the clouds, to make possible a Morse, an Edison, a Marconi, and finally a revolution of the whole industrial world by electrical processes. It was Franklin the printer who was the great man. It was Franklin the boy of poverty who was the potential philosopher and patriot. This man who stood by the cradle of the new-born Republic was Franklin the printer. I read in his autobiography the other day of the privations of his childhood, how little he had to eat, but he said, "I got so I could see that man does not live by bread alone, and out of the very poverty of my daily rations I learned that I had a clear head and a healthy body." Alas, the wealth of the rich men to-day as a rule is their poverty, if they could only see it, and the wealth of the poor man may be his poverty. The great men have come up out of tribulation and trials, and God is ever teaching us that great souls and great characters are above their environment; make their own environment.

We have had a Washington with his wealth and a Lincoln with his poverty to teach us that virtue is neither in wealth or poverty, but is in the individual character, and that alone. We are ever learning these things, and to my mind, without a hint of anything that might be deemed sectarian, I take it to be fundamental that the Great Teacher of the world wrought at the carpenter's bench and was obedient to His parents and to the law of His land, and that after His life of toil He had to go through the wilderness of temptation and then, and not till then, He could "return to Jerusalem in the power of the spirit." The great work did not begin till mighty victories over self had been won. Great men and great characters have their foundation in daily toil, daily labors, and the sacredness of daily duty; where the hand and brain work together achievement and character result. Workingmen are, as a rule, the inventors—men of vision. What gave them that vision? They wrought it out by self-denial and toil and much daily drudgery. Obedience to duty, faith in God, and patience with their fellow men gave them clearness of vision. With such vision Isaiah beheld a world without war in which the weapons of brutality and blood were to be transmuted into implements of peace and industry. This world he saw was the real world, the true world; and the Great Revelator Himself when He beheld the new heaven and the new earth saw the real heaven and the real earth.

We see the counterfeit because we are counterfeit. "What I am I see," is an old proverb and a true one. Lincoln had a vision far-reaching, and the more I study our history and our condition socially, industrially, and politically the more I can see it was an unerring vision. He wrought it out of toil and labor, industry and patience. Coming out of the wilderness of obscurity, of pain and poverty, loving all mankind, with reverence for the highest in the universe and patience for the lowest, this man was finally given the vision. Out of much tribulation it came, and what was it? It was a vision, a reflection of the Great Teacher's vision of eighteen hundred years before, that a house divided against itself could not stand. It meant more than the slavery question. In union he saw national life and immortality; in division he saw death and decay.

It meant that an industrial house divided against itself can not stand. It meant that a social house divided against itself can not stand. It meant that a political house divided against itself can not stand. It meant that in that one word "union" lies all essential progress and all essential happiness. It was a true vision.

Wendell Phillips had a vision. The young man in his humble law office in Boston one day hears an outcry upon the street. He looks out to see an old man dragged by the mob, and at that moment Wendell Phillips, the real Wendell Phillips, the true Wendell Phillips, was born; not the Phillips who might have gone to the Senate, not the Phillips who might have adorned his profession, but Phillips the free, brave, courageous, noble man who devoted the rest of his life to the cause of human freedom, and in the forum of public opinion made slavery a crime. He was not popular. He stemmed the tides of popular ridicule and derision. And he worked and wrought, amid hisses, sneers, and jeers, until he and a few of his brave band had planted the true seed of freedom in the American heart and public opinion made possible a free and united people. Phillips was a self-denying prophet and stood for real progress. Some one said if he had his life to live over again—I do not know who he was—he would be a reformer. If he would be a reformer, however, he must not be an officeseeker. I do not know but it is easier for a camel to go through the needle's eye than for a man who is asking office to be a reformer or to be a real advocate of sound progress. [Applause.]

There is too much flimflam, too much hypocrisy, and too much mask on both sides of the House. Men are not free. They are the toys of every wind and wave upon the turbulent political sea, watching and figuring for votes. Beware of the reformer who is a candidate for office, no matter who he is! Phillips did not run for office. He was not popular. He knew human majorities were not infallible, but that right is invincible in the end. Not until a man is ready to leave all for the truth, like the disciples who left their nets by the sea to follow the Master, is he any good as a reformer or an advocate of real progress. It took a divine genius to sweep the money changers from the temple and make His Father's house a house of prayer instead of a den of thieves, and it takes the divine in us to do that now. Man must be before he can do. Society can not be renovated by men who are not themselves renovated.

Now, I do not want to be misunderstood. I believe that the progressive movement in this country and in the world is, at heart, right. It is a political expression of a law of discontent which is essentially progressive; but there is much on the surface of it that is pretentious and emanates from the politician rather than the patriot. At heart I believe it to be right. The great law of heaven is the law of progress, but it is as silent and as noiseless as the melting of the night into the day. It is a growth. "First the blade, then the ear, and then the full corn in the ear."

But we come to times in the history of the world when there is necessarily great transition periods, just as the bud blossoms into the rose all in a moment. So in political history and in industrial history the growth is evidenced at times by transition periods. So we are to-day in a period of great transition and great change, and at the heart of it this change is right. At the center of it the leaven that is working is the leaven not alone of discontent, but the leaven of true advancement. But it does not come by profession; it does not come by noise; it is not spectacular. The label or brand the man may wear is not always reliable. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

The old Romans thought nothing short of an earthquake could ever disturb the great Roman palace, and yet the tiny weeds of an Italian summer insinuated their roots between the great blocks and rent the palace into a heap of ruins. The great forces of the universe are silent. They are as silent as they are mighty, and the law of progress, which is a law of God, is not accelerated by words but by lives and deeds of righteousness. Lincoln's vision was for the ages, for eternity. It was the brother man; it was love. And I want to take the bold ground, and I believe that within a generation after I have uttered the words it will be recognized within this great legislative body, that love is the foundation and the heart and the source of all real government for the people. And in spite of all remedies and all nostrums that may be advocated, we will never reach the true remedy until man shall invoke in the halls of National and State legislation the golden rule as his guide for legislation and conduct. [Applause.] Call it Utopian, call it a dream, call it what you will. The world has moved obedient to the dreams of great men heretofore and may do so yet.

When God does not give us the direct vision to see without dreams, He lets us see by dreams sometimes. He gave Solomon his mighty vision by a dream when a child, and when He appeared to him and asked him what He should give him he answered, not wealth, not power, not length of days, but clearness of vision to discern between good and evil, between right and wrong.

We would have less selfishness in leadership to-day if men would be governed by such visions. We are living in times of industrial unrest. I am in favor of this bill and in favor of this commission. It is all right. As I intimated on the floor a few minutes ago, communication is the pathway of civilization; information is the first step toward advancement. Man must know his fellow man. This is the first essential to real progress. But I tell you we will never reach the true secret until we recognize that the individual man must do the work within himself. Why, we have become blind; we are unable to-day to discriminate between wealth that comes from thrift and industry and virtue and all the qualities of great manhood, and wealth that is predatory and that comes from wrong and greed and crime. We do not seem to be able to discern between the two. We can not discern between combinations for economy and combinations for monopoly. We have failed to discern between right and wrong, and we are to-day in the midst of confusion.

I have thought it proper and have felt moved to say what I have said to-day because I believe that no Government for the people can very long endure unless we recognize the golden rule. I made a few remarks here once on law and lawbreakers, and when I got through a good friend of mine in the House, who, I guess, thought it was impracticable, as most people do, said,

"Why, you would found the Government on the decalogue." I said, "Yes; I would found it on the decalogue and on the Sermon on the Mount. I would found it on eternal righteousness." And I am willing to-day to lay down all personal and political ambition I have to follow the true leader in this country, whoever he may be, who is willing to face martyrdom and personal defeat that the Government may be permanently established on the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount. [Applause.]

You may boast as much as you will, and you may prate on this floor as much as you will about this theory and that theory, this party and that party, this leader and that leader, and yet away down at the heart of the American people they are asking for greater unselfishness. They are asking for human kindness and the bread of brotherhood.

I have not agreed with the leadership of organized labor on one or two bills here—important bills. I never can, as I view it now, stand for them. I believe they are based on coercive policies that are detrimental and injurious to the permanent welfare of labor, as well as subversive of good feeling between man and man. But I do believe that along the lines of the workingmen's compensation bill, and this bill, and other bills, such as those for shortening the hours of labor and the betterment of labor conditions and the recognition of greater value in labor, lies the true path of legislation; and I feel confident that out of legislation of this character will yet come better conditions, but with them will come that deeper law, written in the hearts of men, a law which forever says, "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them"—the golden rule.

I know that it is very popular to flatter the people. I have all faith and confidence in the people. But as I view history, the leverage of human advancement has been leadership largely. Lincoln had great and supreme confidence in the people, and yet with his vision, reaching far into the future and involving supposedly at that time his defeat, when he had that vision he appealed to whom? The people of the western prairies, to the men who broke the prairies and felled the forests and built the highways, the pioneers of the West.

And, thank God, there was found to be, in that great, plain mass of the people, a balance of good sense and patriotism which led them to give Lincoln the verdict. It is true they sent Douglas to the Senate then, but two years later they sent Lincoln to the White House and to immortal fame. The political destiny of the New World hung at that moment on the great, common, practical, useful people of the western prairies of Illinois. [Applause.]

But, mind you, it took the fire of an inspired soul to arouse the latent wisdom and patriotism of that great people. It took a man so closely united to his fellow men that what he said went to their hearts. This means the progress of a race and the progress of a world; that is what has given us the work of a Moses, a Paul, a Socrates, and the great men of history—the fact that they could appeal and did appeal to that which was best in their fellow men, and they found a response.

So, I say, that in our last resort we must depend upon the people. But I do not care anything about the cheap talk of the people being invincible. "Vox populi, vox Dei" is not true unless it be a godlike people who speak.

The advance of civilization has been the advance of the people as a whole, but it is by individual advancement that the whole advances. "Work out your own salvation" is the law. Our hope is with the people. Our strength as a Nation is in them. It is not in the Washingtons and the Lincolns and the great men. The mountain peaks rise above the common level, but the common level is of the same stuff. So there is in the common heart love and reverence for the Washingtons and Lincolns. That is what gives strength to this Republic—something of the Washington and Lincoln in us all. The meanest man is born to greatness. It is latent but is there. Society may be moved and governed by passion, and, for this reason, must be restrained by constitutions and laws. These are voluntary and necessary restraints which we all need and without which human governments fall. Stability is essential to progress. But leadership is a great lever of progress; not so much, perhaps, as in former times, because intelligence is more generally disseminated, but nevertheless the leader has his important work in our day and country.

There are three great obstacles to human progress—prejudice, greed, and cowardice. I do not know but you might resolve them all into one, and that is ignorance.

All progress finds its obstacle in ignorance. The crowning, sublime, and divine glory of the greatest Teacher who ever trod this earth of ours was that, nailed to the cross, crowned with thorns, and ready to yield his last mortal breath, He said, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." But if we were to subdivide this general cause which is ignorance and be specific, I should say that prejudice, greed, and cowardice are the great obstacles to progress. Prejudice! Why, we have to unlearn most of that we think we know in this world before we can start right. Our very learning is ignorance. There is an arrogance and a conceit in the learning of our day which does not tally with the condition of the mind of the child. The Great Teacher said, "Except ye become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter the kingdom of heaven"—that is to say, truth, the kingdom of real knowledge, the kingdom of real understanding. Humility is the path to greatness. Lincoln understood it, and the great martyrs who have gone to the stake and died for their fellow men knew that not in arrogance, not in conceit, but in humility was to be found the basis of great character and great manhood. The most learned are often the most ignorant and the last to enter the real kingdom.

We are prejudiced in a thousand ways. We do not know our fellow men. The Great Teacher ate with publicans and sinners that he might pour upon them the light of his healing gospel and lift them to a higher plane. We do not enter the shops and toil with the men at the forge and mill or help to bear their burdens. We have little concern for their suffering and their discouragements.

I rode on an elevated train in the city of New York one hot day a year ago, and I saw the little children sleeping out on the fire escapes, because they were almost dying of heat. I said to myself, I ought not to ask to have a dollar in the bank while such suffering exists among my fellow men.

> Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these ye have done it unto me.

We are absorbed in the means of living—the tools and outward appliances of life—more than the life itself. The very wealth of the country thus becomes its poverty. We can never get back of that wonderful parable that I cited once here on this floor, of the man whose ground brought forth so plentifully. Some one came to the Great Teacher and said:

> Speak to my brother that he divide the inheritance.

But the Master said:

> Who made me a divider of the inheritance?

One trouble with all our contention is that, after all, it is a contention for material things. It is a contention of the rich and it is a contention of the poor for the material things, for the meat that perishes and not for the bread of life by which the soul gains access to its eternal God.

Well, the Teacher said, "Who made me a divider over you?" "Beware of covetousness, for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things he possesseth." Then he gave the parable of the rich man whose ground brought forth plentifully. He was an egotist. He had put God out of the universe. He said to his great lordly self, "Where shall I bestow all my fruits?" His barns were not large enough, and he said, "I will tear down my barns and build greater, and there will I bestow my fruits, and then I will say to my soul, take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry, and so forth, for thou hast much goods laid up for many days." He was laying it up, you see, for himself for future days. To say this man was conceited hardly expresses it. "My ground, my fruit, and my barns. I will store up these fruits for my own future if others starve." Alas, he could not bring down a ray of sun nor a drop of dew or rain; he could not stay the early frost; he had not got it in his heart even probably to sufficiently pay the poor toilers who had helped to fill his barns in the midday sun. Thank God, his wealth was his poverty, and the poor man, who worked for less no doubt than he deserved, to fill this man's barns was the richer man of the two. He had a larger soul and faced the future with more hope than this human hog whose greed and avarice had brought him to such miserable poverty of soul. [Applause.]

And what was the judgment? "Thou fool, this day will I require thy soul of thee." Then, whose are these goods? In other words, as I interpret the parable, "Thou fool, I will have thy soul"; I will have kindness to thy fellow man; I will have love for thy fellow man; otherwise thou must die, because all thou hast to show for the years thou hast spent here is the ability to eat and drink. Thou art a fool, and thy soul shall be required of thee.

It is a lesson for the Nation. We have built here upon the foundation of wealth, and God will tear it down unless men are mindful that love is the soul of this great Republic of ours. [Applause.]

The Titanic was a monument to speed and luxury. It went down with all its precious freight, but those on board a ship passing a few days later saw one of the women from the steerage in the icy embrace of death holding up in her frozen arms the dead child she had sheltered to the last. One lesson of love is worth all the Titanics and all the warships you can build while a nation lives. [Applause.] One hero helping the mother and child, the aged and the crippled, into the lifeboat, and then going bravely and unselfishly down to death is worth all the mountains of our material wealth and all the millions God has given us in these days of plenty and prosperity. [Applause.] A monument to speed and luxury! I remember when I thumbed an old schoolbook as a little boy in a country school—and I never had an opportunity to get much further—I wrote some copy, or tried to write, but I think I must have written it mighty poor or but a few times, because I can not write any now—I wrote the proverb, "The more haste the less speed." Speed! We are confusing speed with progress. The more haste the less speed. Be content to work as God works. Then progress will be wholesome, sane, and sure. We worship human leaders. We must have a human idol, but the best of these idols fall shattered at our feet. We are learning not to enshrine our heroes till after they are dead. It is not safe to enshrine a hero until he is dead. While human leadership is essential, and the more unselfish the man the greater the leadership, yet we are learning that our destiny and the destiny of this great Republic do not depend on any particular leader. Thank God for it. Why, they quarreled in the olden time, in Paul's time, about leaders. These were of Paul and these were of Apollos.

And Paul rebuked it. He said, Paul may plant and Apollos water; but God giveth the increase. Do not forget that. The newly created wealth, the wealth born to-day, the wealth from soil and mine and sea is God's and God's alone, for the earth and the fullness thereof are His. There never was such fullness in any other land in the history of mankind as there is in this. There never was such a land of plenty, such a land where all true industry might find a just reward, if we but believed and had faith in our ability to so order it; a land of prosperity beyond the dreams of man. What is the trouble?

Years ago they wrote into the Declaration of Independence something about the inalienable rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and the Nation in its history has had its parallel really of those different stages. First, life. The Nation was born, born in revolution. Second, liberty. It was liberty that came out of thick darkness of civil conflict, from 1861 to 1865—life and liberty of a nation.

It was not until we had stricken off the manacles from the slave and emerged from the thick darkness of that mighty struggle that we began to think and study this third principle or stage of progress, the pursuit of happiness; and we are only now on the eve of that great era in which man is learning, thank God, slowly but nevertheless surely, that the pursuit of happiness is not the pursuit of wealth. It is the pursuit of an untroubled and unselfish and loving state of the human soul in which man is willing that his neighbor shall share in the prosperity and the bounties of God, in which he shares. That is the pursuit of happiness. Even now it begins to dawn anew on this Republic, and inspite of strife—party strife, industrial the common man, and will yet leaven all humanity. Our problem since the war has been the problem of production, but the pursuit of happiness now bids us stop and inquire whether distribution is right and just, whether we should not readjust our industrial system upon the basis of greater justice to the man who is down. [Applause.]

That is the question that concerns us all.

Mr. Chairman, I have spoken wholly offhand and somewhat disconnectedly, and I am very grateful for the patient attention of the House. I may ask to revise these remarks. Possibly I may have conveyed some erroneous impressions in what I have said; but I say this in conclusion, Utopian as it may seem, impractical and dreamy as it may seem, that this Nation was founded not alone on the idea of liberty, but the possibility of the individual soul, the infinite possibility of the individual. That is where the everlasting greatness of the great Teacher appears in the light of history, in that He realized the possibility of the individual soul, and in no land under God's blue sky, in no age, has civilization reached a better vision than we have in this country. strife, social strife—the leaven of righteousness is working in Imperfect, sadly imperfect yet, but the hope of the ages. In spite of all the unrest and turbulence upon the surface, at the center the Master speaks, and as the Master was called when the ship was in the storm to still the tempest, so all that is needed for good government here and now, whoever is President, for real and permanent prosperity, is the spirit of the Master which is forever saying, Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you. [Applause.] Peace be still.

The verdict of the world has always been wrong. Cowardice has been in high places. Pilate sat on the throne, with truth manacled and in chains before him, and a good, loyal, clear-visioned wife saw the danger and warned him. But no; Pilate did just what you and I do when we stop to count votes back in the district that we come from. He consulted the people. He worshiped numerical majorities, forgetting that one with God is a majority. He could not distinguish between that which is heaven born and potential—the inner soul of the people—and the passion and hate of the ignorant, and the world's humiliation and disgrace followed, because a coward sat on the bench, a coward who feared the people. Yes; he feared the people. He feared that which was worst in the people, not that which was best, but nevertheless he feared that in the people which was more at the surface, and the world's great Teacher went to the cross.

The world's verdict has always been wrong. I expect that in this House I am practically through, but I tell you one thing, that the brave and fearless men on either side this Chamber who follow the lamp of conscience without counting votes at home are the hope of all progressive legislation, whether the administration be Republican or Democratic. [Applause.] Only the man who will stand, if right demands it, against that which seems to be popular, and true as the needle to the pole follow duty's path, deserves a name in history. Better have one day here and speak the truth that God has given you than dwell here half a century to be the toy of every shifting and momentary passion of men. [Applause.]

The world's verdict has been wrong in every age. No great pioneer of truth has been received in his day. They have endured chains and dungeons, persecutions and, finally, death in defense of the truth, because the people of their day were not up to the leadership of the day. It will be so, but not always, I hope, for I have the feeling that here there will be such a universal predominance of good fellowship and brotherhood as to render it impossible that a great man shall be denied in his day. But the world's verdicts have been wrong.

I read somewhere the other day among some old papers that I fished out in my library a poem, which I wish I had, and if I had known I was going to speak to-day I would have brought it here. It is about the world's real victors. They are, after all, the vanquished. The world gave them no crown. He pictured the real hero as the man who meets defeat for the right. He "Sang the hymn of the conquered, who fell in the battle of life, the hymn of the wounded, who died overwhelmed in the strife."

It was written by a man by the name of Story; I think he was the son of Judge Story. He was an artist. He pays a tribute to the obscure hero, the man who is not dying and selling his soul for a little fame or wealth for to-day but who stands heroically in the path of duty, trusting God and his own better nature for his reward. [Applause.] I close with his last lines, worthy of more than a passing thought in these times of ours:

I stand on the field of defeat,
In the shadow, with those who are fallen and wounded and dying, and there
Chant a requiem low, place my hand on their pain-knotted brows, breathe a prayer,
Hold the hand that is helpless, and whisper, "They only the victory win,
Who have fought the good fight, and have vanquished the demon that tempts us within;
Who have held to their faith unseduced by the prize that the world holds on high;
Who have dared for a high cause to suffer, resist, fight—if need be, to die."
Speak, History! Who are Life's victors? Unroll thy long annals, and say,
Are they those whom the world called the victors—who won the success of a day?
The martyrs, or Nero? The Spartans who fell at Thermopylæ's tryst,
Or the Persians and Xerxes? His judges or Socrates? Pilate or Christ?

[Loud applause.]

[Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request to extend his remarks in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

Mr. NYE. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the bill now before the committee.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] would like permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

[Mr. SMALL addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if I thought the creation of this industrial commission would be of advantage to a single laborer in the United States, apart from those who will be employed upon the commission, I would gladly vote for this bill; but as I view it, in the light of legislation already enacted and in view of the existence of a Bureau of Labor and the passage of a bill creating a Department of Labor, both of which are to do the work that this commission is now called upon to do, I regard the measure as expensive and unnecessary. I agree with the argument of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], who has gone into this question thoroughly and from the viewpoint of a careful legislator and representative of the people. It is said that a commission of this kind will be able to give to the country information with regard to the causes of unrest. We know what the causes of unrest are. Every one of us has a sort of instinct that we understand what are the causes of unrest. The manufacturer knows, and the laborer and the farmer knows. What everyone interested wants to know is how a remedy may be provided for the causes of unrest that already exist. No remedy is suggested by the creation of this commission. The men to be appointed upon it shall have it in their power to send for books and papers, put witnesses on the stand, and, instead of allaying the unrest, foment it. The country has had enough investigations. The Democratic Party has deemed it wise to use the money of the people of the United States in a series of investigations into all sorts of questions. Now, upon the presumption that it is in the interest of labor, it is proposed to take $500,000 of labor's money and spend it to obtain information that the country already possesses. I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] awhile ago whether the commission would have any power, after it learned the causes of unrest, to enforce any recommendation it might make, and he answered "No," as he answered "No" with respect to the Department of Labor which was under discussion the other day. What, then, is the purpose of this commission? What good can it do? It will send for books and papers, and it will put witnesses upon the stand, and it will halt men who are doing business, it will call up the men in the mills and the men who are earning their wage and take their time telling of their troubles, which are now very generally understood.

Conditions in this country now, by reason of the various investigations already underway, are such that the business man is unable to tell just how to do business—and let me tell you I speak in the interest of the wage earner in the country, whether organized or unorganized, when I speak in behalf of the business man.

Labor is the creator of all wealth. That is true, but labor can create wealth in a shack, in a swamp, if labor wants to remain there. My estimate of labor is that it wants to get away from its separate environment and obtain some of the other benefits that come from association in life, and association means a combination of effort which ultimately leads to some one, labor leader or manufacturer, becoming the head of the concern. Now, then, if labor is to be profitably employed, business must have a show; the manufacturer must have a chance to give employment to labor, or the laborer, if he cares to leave his position as a laborer, may himself become an employer and give an opportunity to earn wages to those who desire the opportunity.

If we are to deal with this bill solely upon the ground that it might help us bring together the employer and the employee, let us see where this industrial commission leads. It is to have no power except to investigate and disturb existing conditions. It is to investigate and inquire into such labor troubles as exist. Is it to stop a strike that is causing unrest and taking the wage-earning power away from the workingman and stopping the wheels of industry? No; it has no such power; it is simply to tell of the unrest that results from such a condition. And, pray, what good is that to the man who wants the wage to pay for his daily bread? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] says that after all this is a question of human nature. Then how are you going to regulate it by law or by a commission? A strike is on. The employee contends that he has been unfairly treated by the superintendent of the employer. Where does this commission serve to bring together those who differ as to the treatment of the hands by the superintendent of the mill? The commission hears that a strike is on; it visits the locality at the expense of the laboring man; it sits there in dignity and sends for witnesses, has the books and papers presented, spends the time and money of the Government, to make its inquiry. Does it stop the strike; does it improve the conditions in the mill of which the workmen complain? Or let us take another case.

The men say that a wage of $2.50 is not sufficient and they want $3 a day. They strike to obtain the higher wage. Has this commission any power to enable them to obtain that higher wage? Will it give any assistance to those who are striving to better their financial condition? Why, the commission will simply tell what the world is full well advised upon. It does not have any power to change the wage conditions. The employer contends that he is paying all that the business will enable him to pay, and the employee says that the business is able to pay more than the wage that is paid. What are you going to do about it? Now, pray tell me wherein the industrial commission, costing the people $500,000, will benefit either the employer or the employee to the extent of a single cent or will add in any particular to the bringing of those two elements together. I said if I thought this bill would benefit labor I would vote for it, but as I see it now it means only the creation of another commission that will add to rather than allay the unrest that prevails.

Mr. DONOHOE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DONOHOE. I was going to ask my friend and colleague whether he considers organized labor is working a benefit or an injury to the cause of labor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I consider organized labor a decided benefit to the labor of the country.

Mr. DONOHOE. What is the attitude of organized labor toward this measure?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The attitude of organized labor, as explained by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON], is favorable to this measure, and I have asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] how many men are organized in this country out of the 30,000,000 wage earners, and the gentleman answers, what is the fact, that the total number of organized wage earners out of the 30,000,000 is 3,000,000.

Mr. DONOHOE. As those 3,000,000 are well versed in labor matters and doing good work in its cause, would not a measure advocated by them be beneficial to all labor?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will answer the gentleman by asking whether he is in favor of the creation of this commission by putting only the organized-labor men on and leaving the 27,000,000 other wage earners, including the farmers of the country, out of consideration?

Mr. DONOHOE. I believe that all labor is in favor of this measure.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman understands that all labor whatsoever is in favor of this measure, and I am glad to have the gentleman come in under that standard.

It is not necessary to prolong a statement of this kind. Industrial commissions are not new in this country. We had an industrial commission created by the act of 1898, 14 years ago, that went over this country taking testimony, sending for persons, books, and papers, to find out the conditions that prevailed in regard to labor, agriculture, and immigration. We had as a result of their work 19 very profuse volumes of statistics, which no one, including the laboring men of this country, has ever read. We have had a commission on immigration and have spent a great deal of the money of the people endeavoring to find out whether we can improve the immigration conditions that prevail in the United States. Nearly a million of dollars was spent by that commission, with the result that we are now receiving volumes of testimony, statistics, and figures, upward of 40 in number, which, perhaps, will never be read by any individual in the United States save the proof reader. The question is whether labor is benefited by investigations and inquiries of this kind. If the real purpose of the gentlemen on the other side, particularly of my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON], who so well represents organized labor upon this floor, is to bring the employer and employee together, it can be done better by some other measure than that which means from the time of the passage of this bill that inquisitors are again to go into the industrial establishments of the country and possibly widen the breach between capital and labor. [Applause.]

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not abuse the patience of the House very long. Unfortunately I was out during a part of the time that my friend from New Jersey, Mr. KINKEAD, was making his impassioned appeal for his carnivorous constituency in New Jersey.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman be willing to yield, stating how much time he desires, in order that a request may be submitted to close debate on the bill? How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Not over three or four minutes, anyhow.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all general debate on this bill close at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN]—not later than 10 minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I shall not consume 10 minutes; but you can put it in that way if you so desire.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be closed at the expiration of the time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I heard just enough of the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey to indicate that in an effort, earnest, honest, and commendable, to secure relief for his constituents from the high cost of living he has suggested that one of the important and principal products of that section of the country from which I come, that portion which I partly represent, shall be thrown open to the unrestricted competition of the world.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that seems to me an unfair application of the tariff laws and of the principle of assessing a customs tax. I stand for a reduction of all tariff laws to the lowest possible figure consistent with the raising of an adequate revenue for the support of an economically administered Government. But I am not willing that the people whom I represent should have their interests stricken down in behalf of any other section of the country.

Mr. CURLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have only five minutes. Wait until I get through, and if I have any more time I will yield to you. I am not willing that we should have to make the entire sacrifice in order to lower the cost of living. The people who produce cattle are just as important in this country as any other. The fact that there is a great trust, or a number of great trusts, known as the "Beef Trusts," which dominate this trade, is taken advantage of to try to create a prejudice against the cattle growers themselves. God knows the cattle growers would like to be exempt from the exactions of the Beef Trusts, and if the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD] or any other Member can suggest any feasible and quick method of exterminating these trusts I will give him my word I will immediately enlist under his banner for that crusade.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, may I ask my friend how much revenue the United States Government derives from the importation of beef?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Not a great deal, I suppose.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Not a dollar, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Not a great deal.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman read some figures from some publication, I believe, of the Department of Agriculture, to show that there was no scarcity of beef cattle in this country.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me. My statement proved that something like 574,000,000 pounds of beef and 1,053,000,000 pounds of pork were exported from this country abroad, and my conclusion would have been, if I had been permitted to conclude, that the way to abolish the Beef Trust, assuming that it is acting in good faith with the Department of Justice to-day, I having been assured by Mr. Wickersham that before the 1st day of August the trusts will submit to him a plan resolving themselves into their constituent companies—I say to my friend from Texas that if they are "on the level" in this thing, if they are square—and I am going to assume that they are square until I have more than a mere suspicion in my soul to the contrary—I will say to him that if this dissolution occurs, then the only way on earth to put down to his people and to my people beefsteaks at an honest and a reasonable figure is to take the duty off of every pound of beef that comes into this country, whether from Mexico, or Canada, or Argentina, or Australia.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that is the conclusion that the gentleman did not get a chance to make in his own speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Well, I yielded to the gentleman.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And I yielded to the gentleman, too.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that the people whom I represent ought not to be made the victims of the wide and violent hostility toward the trusts. Again I say to the gentleman that I am ready to do all that I can in cooperation with him and others in the suppression of the trusts.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. If the gentleman will permit me, Mr. Chairman, I stated to him, and I thought he understood me, and said it as loudly as my poor lungs would allow, that I was glad that in Fort Worth on the 18th day of May they sold cattle for 9½ or 9¼ cents a pound. I am glad of that, very glad of that; and they can continue to sell their cattle at 9½ cents a pound, and I hope that that is a fair return on their investment. But I say to my friend from Texas—and I believe he will bear me out in this, representing, as he does, a cattle-raising community—that if he finds that the farmers are able to raise the cattle that they sell for 9¼ cents a pound for 5 or 6 cents a pound, they occupy the same position toward the American consumer, the same unjust, indefensible position, that I claim the Beef Trust occupies to-day. We are content to give them an honest profit on their production, and glad to see them get it; but I do not think that the gentleman from Texas or any other man in this House, representing a cattle-raising community, should ask that they receive an unjust price for the cattle which they raise, an unfair price, and a dishonest price.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the gentleman from Texas will be able to give a categorical answer to that question. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not think that the cattle raisers of Texas have ever received, or expect to receive, an unfair price in the markets. They are compelled to sell the bulk of their cattle to the trusts. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD] says the trusts have the power to fix the price that they pay to the cattle raiser. I contend that if they have the power that they are alleged to have, they will never fix a price that is too liberal.

I believe that the high price obtained for cattle from the ranges is due to the scarcity of cattle. I am assured of that fact by gentlemen who are engaged in the business, by men who live in the vicinity where the cattle are raised, and by gentlemen who are only interested in the prosperity of their neighbors, that there is now a scarcity of cattle on the plains of Texas and New Mexico and Colorado.

What the supply may be in other sections of the country I do not know. I am not myself a producer of cattle, but I do know that, taking it one year with another, good seasons and bad seasons, taking it on the average, the cattle producers have not had an unfair profit, have not had a too liberal return for their investment.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. In the month of May there was exported from the harbor of New York 25,000,000 pounds of beef. Now, I say to the gentleman that I believe there is a scarcity of cattle in Texas, Colorado, and Montana, due to conditions of which he and I are aware. They are no longer able to range their cattle on land that belongs to the Government.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Unfenced and free.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Unfenced and free, as the gentleman rightly says; and he knows that the cost of feeding cattle is greater to-day than it ever was before. But I will say to my friend that the condition that confronts his people and the people of Colorado and Montana is the direct result of the operations of the Beef Trust, that he and I know controls the price in the market.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think the gentleman is, to some extent, mistaken. The fact that we no longer have a free range accounts for the increased cost of producing cattle.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I should like to ask the Chairman if those five minutes are not about up.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Just one sentence, Mr. Chairman. I want to set my friend from New Jersey right in one particular. The cost of raising cattle has enormously increased. The trust is not responsible for the fact that these Western States have settled up and that land is higher, and that the interest on the investment is greater. It is because people have gone in there. They raise too many people in New Jersey, and they have gone out west.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. There can not be too many people raised in New Jersey, because they are a blessing to the rest of the world wherever they go; but I agree with the gentleman as to his other proposition in the main.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I call for the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a commission is hereby created to be called the Commission on Industrial Relations. Said commission shall be composed of nine persons, to be appointed by the President of the United States, not less than two of whom shall be employers of labor and not less than two of whom shall be representatives of organized labor. The Department of Commerce and Labor is authorized to cooperate with said commission in any manner and to whatever extent the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may approve.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "States," insert the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The amendment was agreed to.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 1, line 7, strike out the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard a moment touching that amendment. I am inclined to think that the bill as introduced was to be preferred, rather than the bill as proposed to be amended by this amendment. It is as follows:

Said commission shall be composed of nine persons to be appointed by the President of the United States, not less than two of whom—shall be employers of labor, and not less than two of whom shall be representatives of organized labor.

As proposed to be amended the bill provides that not less than three of them shall be employers of labor, and not less than three of them representatives of organized labor. That leaves three others for the President to appoint not employers and not of organized labor. Who he would appoint I do not know. But after all is said and done, 3,000,000 people in organized labor and less than 1,000,000 employers, making 4,000,000 out of 95,000,000, are to be represented by the six men in these two classes of three each if the committee amendment is agreed to. Organized labor and employers represent only 4,000,000 people out of 95,000,000. There are many laborers besides those in organized labor, American citizens, people in all kinds of production. Now, certainly they have some right to representation. I do not see that 4,000,000 people ought to have two-thirds of the membership of this commission. Therefore, it seems to me that the bill had better stand as it was originally introduced. After all is said and done, no man lives to himself. I have always stood indorsing organized labor. I have always said that if I lived in the sweat of my face, under existing conditions I would agree with my fellows in making a contract. Perhaps an equally advantageous contract could not be made if they would go singly. I doubt if it could be made with profit and safety and justice through the single individual, as he would go to make his contract alone.

But after all, labor that is not organized labor, labor on the farm, labor in clerical positions, labor in jobbing houses, labor in retail establishments, labor everywhere is just as honorable as if it were organized and entitled to just as much right to be represented on this commission as others have.

Every man has the right as long as he obeys the law to do what he pleases. A good many of us would be in a bad fix if we did not have that right. A man has the right to be a bear if he wants to be as long as he obeys the law.

Now, I doubt the wisdom of taxing 95,000,000 people for this commission unless it will perform a real service. I sometimes tliink we are running commission mad. I recollect the other industrial commission which resulted in the publication of 19 volumes, and there is a wonderful lot of essays in the 19 volumes. I have examined it. I doubt if I call up, however, one by one the gentlemen of this House and ask them to state truthfully—I doubt if there is a majority in this House that knows that there was any commission of that kind; and I doubt if there is a small minority that ever read any considerable portion of that report. It is a wonderfully able report.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the time of his colleague be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. If this commission is to be a useful commission it should represent fairly well the American people. Now, I have no complaint against the three commissioners of employers, in the event that this commission is adopted, and three from the organized labor; they would probably be wise men. I have never occupied any time in this House attacking the employers, a million of them. They serve a useful purpose. Under the changed conditions of production there have got to be employers, and they are really employees of those they employ. We are all employees in the broad sense. We are employees of the whole people. The lawyers are the employees of their clients, and so on. At the same time employers are employees. Now, I am not going to call them Gradgrinds. I am not going to abuse them for organizing trusts unless they are found guilty. I believe in the Sherman Antitrust Act, and I believe in the enforcement of the law against trusts. I voted for the Sherman Antitrust Act and stand ready to vote for apt and proper amendments to it. But let us have a commission one less employer and one less of organized labor, as the gentleman who introduced this bill, Mr. HUGHES, proposed when he introduced it. That will give four, and it will give six for the 90,000,000 people who are not in a technical sense employers and are not in organized labor.

Therefore, for one, I shall not vote for this committee amendment.

So far as the employees are concerned, the best expression of the employees' desires and sentiments and wishes is found where those employed associate themselves together in the form of an organization or trades-union. If the employees are to be represented on that commission, then the representatives should come from that best expression of the employees, organized labor. Hence I believe that this should be amended to be three instead of two.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CANNON) there were 81 ayes and 11 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, strike out the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, there are two distinct reasons why this was made three members all round. There are three recognized elements in society so far as it affects industries in the different lines. The employee, the employer, and the public at large. Now, it is fit, if a commission is to be appointed to investigate the industrial situation, that each of these elements should be equally represented on that commission.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read section 2.

The Clerk read section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the members of this commission shall be paid actual traveling and other necessary expenses and in addition a compensation of $10 per diem while actually engaged on the work of the commission and while going to or returning from such work. The commission is authorized as a whole, or by subcommittees of the commission, duly appointed, to hold sittings and public hearings anywhere in the United States, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses and to compel testimony, and to employ such secretaries, experts, stenographers, and other assistants as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes for which such commission is created, and to authorize its members or its employees to travel in or outside the United States on the business of the commission.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

After the word "created," in line 15, page 2, insert "and to rent such offices, to purchase such books, stationery, and other supplies as may be necessary to carry out the purposes for which such commission is created."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 16, after the word "supplies," insert a comma and the following: "and to have such printing and binding done."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER. Does that amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois cover printing of testimony? It is to cover such printing as may be necessary for the purposes of the commission, but the commission is not authorized to have the printing of the testimony done.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. In my judgment it would cover the entire printing of the hearings.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt it would.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It is the language used when committees are authorized to have printing and binding done.

Mr. COOPER. I did not know but that it was worded so that it would not permit the testimony to be printed.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this is a pretty broad authority that this commission is given, to investigate in the United States or anywhere in the world. With that statement I desire to call attention to the committee amendment:

And to rent such offices, to purchase such books, stationery, and other supplies, as may be necessary to carry out the purposes for which such commission is created.

It will have authority to rent offices in Washington, offices in New York, offices in San Francisco, offices in London, or elsewhere. It is a pretty broad provision. It is true that there are only $100,000, as I understand it, that are to be appropriated for the first year, but $500,000 is contemplated before the work is finished, and if this commission carries on as broad an investigation as they are authorized to do, $500,000 will be but a drop in the bucket. I would be glad to know whether or not it is contemplated to have offices in foreign countries. However, I suppose no gentleman could answer that question because we do not know who will be on the commission. Is it supposed to be probable or possible that offices in foreign countries will be rented?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it is not contemplated that offices shall be secured in foreign countries. It is contemplated that offices might be secured in the city of Washington, and also that there might possibly arise occasions, when it is necessary to have hearings elsewhere than in the District of Columbia, where it would be necessary to rent rooms in which to hold hearings. Beyond that there was nothing contemplated.

Mr. CANNON. But my friend and myself both before this commission performs may be with the angels. Nobody can say what this commission will do. I call attention to the fact that it can rent offices anywhere, and it is expressly authorized so to do. I call attention to the query of whether it is not wise to limit the power to rent offices.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 19, strike out the words "or outside."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the language of the bill is as follows:

And to authorize its members or its employees to travel in or outside the United States on the business of the commission.

The amendment that I offer is to strike out the words "or outside," which will simply authorize members or employees to travel in the United States. The purpose of the amendment is this: If they send members or employees into foreign countries, it will of necessity be for the purpose of obtaining information. They will have no authority to compel the attendance of witnesses, nor will any purpose be subserved by sending members or employees to other countries except to get such information as has already been collated and published in such countries, and all such information already obtained in other countries will be accessible to this commission by correspondence or by application or in some other way. I think this bill ought not to contain any provision which will give color to any junket trip on the part of its members or employees, unless some essential and necessary benefit can be secured by it. It will involve large expense, encroach upon the appropriation which is made for the use of this commission, and I think the words "or outside" ought to be stricken out, so that the commission, so far as traveling is concerned, will be limited to the United States, leaving still open to them the opportunity of obtaining such information as is accessible in other countries, which can be obtained in other ways, instead of sending its members or employees to such countries.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that to strike out the words proposed to be stricken out would cripple to a considerable extent the commission and the work which it is proposed to have it undertake. All of the information that is available or that might be available in foreign countries is not available in such form as that it can be reached through correspondence. If you strike that provision from the bill, then neither a member of the commission nor any of its employees can be sent into any foreign country for the purpose of getting information which might be valuable for us in arriving at a determination of the best methods of handling our industrial situation. We ought to have the very best that the world affords, and in order that we may have the best that the world affords this commission or such of its members as it may deem necessary or its employees ought to have the privilege of going to other countries to investigate the industrial situation as they find it there, with a view of securing the best that may be secured, and with the further purpose of avoiding mistakes which other countries may have made. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That said commission may report to the Congress its findings and recommendations from time to time, and shall make a final report not later than three years after the date of the approval of this act, at which time the term of this commission shall expire, unless it shall previously have made final report, and in the latter case the term of the commission shall expire with the making of its final report; and the commission shall make at least one report to the Congress within the first year of its appointment and a second report within the second year of its appointment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 23, after the words "later than," strike out "three years" and insert "one year."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this amendment contemplates closing up the work of the commission within one year. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON], has indicated that he intends to ask for only $100,000 in order to do the work during the first year. My contention is that the work of the commission can very well be completed within one year and we ought to save the remaining $400,000 of the people's money.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, the work proposed by this bill could not be accomplished and completed within one year; in fact, it will hurry any commission to complete the work in three years and complete it properly. I hope that the amendment will not be adopted.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 23, page 2, by inserting, after the word "report," the following: "And said final report shall be accompanied by the testimony taken and the proceedings had by the commission or any subcommittee thereof.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that the purpose of this is to avoid any question, and that all the testimony had by the commission, as well as any subcommittee of the commission, should be made a part of the official report, so that Congress and those interested may have the full testimony, so as to judge themselves as to the conclusions reported, and I believe it will have a good effect to give the commission authority to have all this testimony printed, and that the proceedings should accompany the final report. That is what the proposition is.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that any amendment such as that instead of making it obligatory upon the commission to submit the hearings with its report if it becomes obligatory upon the commission to print the hearings that is all that should be asked. There is no necessity for its accompanying the report. As a matter of fact, it would be very much more valuable if the hearings were printed from time to time, and made available as printed, instead of waiting until the report was made.

Mr. RAKER. That is the very purpose of the amendment—to have it appear at some place that all the testimony and proceedings had should be printed, and when the final report is made in the meantime all the testimony may be had, so that anyone might go over the report and the conclusions and determine whether or not they have been properly drawn from the testimony.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I hope the amendment in the form in which it is presented will not be agreed to, and that later on an amendment may be agreed to that will authorize the printing of the hearings from time to time.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I will detain the committee but a moment. Permit me to suggest an amendment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania which I think will meet with his approval, or rather two amendments. In line 22, page 2, after the word "recommendations," insert the words "and submit the testimony taken," so that the sentence will read: "That said commission may report to the Congress its findings and recommendations and submit the testimony taken from time to time."

And in line 23, after the word "report," add the words "accompanied by the testimony not previously submitted," so that there will be definite times fixed when the commission must report the testimony, otherwise you will have nothing requiring the testimony to be reported. These amendments are in accordance with my suggestions early in the debate.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin very much more acceptable than the one offered by the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I would accept the amendment; it is simply in different language, but it is intended to cover the same thing. I have no objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment in lieu of the amendment offered by the gentleman from California, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 22, page 2, after the word "recommendations," insert the words "and submit the testimony taken."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment to follow the next line.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 23, on page 2, after the word "report," insert the words "accompanied by the testimony not previously submitted."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the commission shall inquire into the general condition of labor, especially in the principal industries of the United States, and especially in those which are carried on in corporate forms; into existing relations between employers and employees; into the effect of industrial conditions on public welfare and into the rights and powers of the community to deal therewith; into the growth of associations of employers and of wage earners and the effect of such associations upon the relations between employers and employees; into the extent and results of methods of collective bargaining; into any methods which have been tried in any State or in foreign countries for maintaining mutually satisfactory relations between employees and employers; into methods for avoiding or adjusting labor disputes through peaceful and conciliatory mediation and negotiations; and into the scope, and methods, and resources of existing bureaus of labor and into possible ways of increasing their usefulness. The commission shall seek to discover and to point out the underlying causes of dissatisfaction in the industrial situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments to page 3 of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 7, strike out the comma after the word "labor" and the word "especially" immediately following the comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 20, strike out the word "and" at the end of the line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 21, strike out the word "and" following the word "scope."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, lines 23 and 24, strike out the words "And to point out."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 25, insert the following after the word "situation": "And report its conclusions thereon."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 8, amend by adding after the words "United States" the words "including agriculture."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 20, by inserting after the word "negotiations" the words "and compulsory methods.

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, in presenting this amendment providing for investigation of compulsory methods of settling labor disputes, as set forth in H. R. 21094, being a bill to create a commission on industrial relations, I desire to say that the methods of settling strikes and labor disputes by peaceful and conciliatory mediation and negotiation have not proven the success that it was generally hoped for. We have had some very severe strikes in our own State of Massachusetts, where, probably, there is in operation to-day one of the most successful boards of arbitration and conciliation that is to be found anywhere in the entire country. We have a strike situation at New Bedford, in Massachusetts, where 14,000 operatives went on a strike on Monday last against conditions obtaining in the textile industries. The State board of conciliation and arbitration endeavored by every lawful and peaceful method to avoid that labor dispute.

And what is true of Massachusetts is likewise true of nearly every other section of the country. I realize that the majority of leading labor leaders are opposed to the proposition of compulsory settlement of labor disputes and that many of the leading capitalists are likewise opposed to the settlement of disputes by compulsory methods. But, Mr. Chairman, the facts remain that after bad blood has been engendered in consequence of a labor dispute and they strike, the participants are not ones who are likely to lie down together and settle their differences. And if one insists on his right to refrain from being a party to the settlement of those differences, then the State itself should have sufficient power to insist on a reasonable and equitable adjustment that they must accept.

From 1881 to 1905 there were 36,757 strikes in the United States of America. From 1881 to 1900, 330,500 employees were thrown out of employment by strikes or lockouts. Now, then, Mr. Chairman, as to what it represents to the State, as well as to invested capital, it has been proven that voluntary conciliation and arbitration between disputants—the employer and employee—have been an absolute failure.

Now, if this commission proposes to expend a sum of money to investigate this proposition, I believe they should go to the root of it and consider the feasibility of recommending and investigating the question of compulsory arbitration.

One of the best works written upon this particular proposition is written by Henry Demorest Lloyd, who deals with the situation in New Zealand, a country without strikes, although a very small country. But, nevertheless, it is a country in which it was necessary to adopt legislation providing for the compulsory settlement of disputes in consequence of a water-front strike.

The following is a list of some of the strikes in this country:

Massachusetts railroad strike, 1834: Riots, militia called out to suppress the disturbance.
Philadelphia weavers, 1842: Very disorderly.
Philadelphia brickmakers, 1843: Much rioting and destruction of property.
Great railroad strike, 1877: Rioting and burning, troops overpowered by mobs, 12 men killed at Baltimore and many more at Pittsburgh, millions of property destroyed.
Gould railroad strike, 1886: Violence and destruction.
New York street car strike, 1889: Riotous conduct, one striker shot.
Buffalo strike, 1892: Riots, troops, bloodshed, entire State militia called out.
Homestead strike, 1892: Riots, Pinkerton's battle, many lives lost; much property destroyed, 40 nonunion men poisoned at their meals.
Coal Creek Valley miners' strike, Tennessee, 1892: Fighting and burning, State troops called out.
Silk workers' strike, Paterson, N. J., 1894: Rioting and mob violence.
Great coal miners' strike in 11 States and 1 Territory, 1894: Whole counties terrorized, strikers intrenched in open insurrection, much property destroyed, troops powerless to preserve order, shooting, eviction, dynamite assassination, kidnaping, torture, pitched battles, many lives lost.
Chicago strike, 1894: Mobs, riots, troops, loss of life and property.
Brooklyn street car strike, 1895: Rioting and destruction.
Philadelphia street car strike, 1895: Some disturbance and destruction.

Justice demands that this incessant warfare between capital and labor cease, since its continuance is more destructive to society than the individuals involved.

The right to compulsorily arbitrate existing differences is evidenced in our courts every day where civil and criminal cases are heard and the machinery of the law constantly invoked to enforce the degrees of our courts.

It is contended by those who oppose compulsory arbitration of industrial disputes that the findings of a board of conciliation and arbitration with the power to enforce its findings might prove a severe hardship to one or the other of the interested parties despite the fact capital and labor would enjoy equal representation upon the board, whereas neither is represented specifically at court, yet the mandates of the tribunal are respected and obeyed.

When nations differ to-day it is customary to submit for adjudication the question involved to The Hague tribunal rather than indulge in strife; then where is the justice or logic in permitting differences between employer and employee to be settled in the primitive and abhorrent method which now obtains?

In 15 years, from 1881 to 1896, the Commissioner of Labor estimated that the wage loss through strikes and lockouts was $51,814,000 and the employers' losses $30,701,000.

Consider the sufferings and hardships entailed by this huge loss, realize that conditions are not growing more Utopian, and appreciate the necessity and value of this amendment.

The spirit of the times is for cooperation, and the necessity for labor and capital to be upon most friendly terms must be apparent to every man.

Labor is necessary to capital, and capital is necessary to labor; and the law should have the right in the interest of society, when one is treating the other unjustly, to establish the line of demarcation.

The failure of voluntary arbitration in the United States is attested by the fact that between 1881 and 1905 but one and six-tenths of 1 per cent of labor disputes were settled by this method.

The primary purpose of the New Zealand conciliation and arbitration act was to promote industrial peace by the substitution of orderly hearings by impartial State tribunals rather than by the violent and brutal methods common to strikes and lockouts.

Since the adoption of compulsory arbitration in New Zealand there have been no strikes, sweatshops have been abolished, wages increased, and peace, happiness, and prosperity general in the country.

It has been demonstrated that victory by either side is not proof that the side which loses in a strike was wrong or that the side which won was right, but that capital has rights, as has labor, which must be conserved for the good of all.

The custom now common of discharging men in anticipation of their intention to organize or seek redress upon any proposition has been prevented by the New Zealand act, which grants the aggrieved parties the right within six weeks after the strike or lockout to appeal to the court, get full consideration and redress, and the court can stop the strike which it was denied the chance to prevent.

Thus, compulsion assures peace and liberty, freedom to work, to contract, and to live happily in the enjoyment of the fruits of honest capital and honest industry.

The Massachusetts State Board of Arbitration in 1896 settled 16 out of 29 cases, and if they possessed compulsory powers they would have unquestionably settled every case presented.

The primary purpose of government is the promotion of peace and happiness, and the righting of any economic wrong by peaceful methods should be within the power of the Government.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CURLEY] and I can not agree on the idea of compulsory arbitration. Many of us, in fact most of us, are perfectly willing that compulsion should be used, provided that it is used on the other fellow and that we are the beneficiaries of it.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate on this section and all pending amendments thereto.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can not take me off the floor by a motion to close debate in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] will continue.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I simply want to call attention to the fact that this section provides for the investigation of all methods, including compulsory arbitration, so that the gentleman's amendment is unnecessary.

Mr. CURLEY. Where is that contained?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is in this language:

Into the extent and results of methods of collective bargaining; into any methods which have been tried in any State or in foreign countries for maintaining mutually satisfactory relations between employees and employers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CURLEY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, at the end of section 4, the following:

"And furnish such information and suggest such laws as may be made a basis for uniform legislation by the various States of the Union in order to harmonize conflicting interests and to be equitable to the laborer, the employer, the producer, and the consumer."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, when State legislatures are asked to pass laws in the interest of labor, liberalizing trade conditions, objection is at once raised that such legislation would handicap the manufacturers of that State to such an extent that it would injure their business and give it to manufacturers of an adjoining State. The argument is always made that the equality of competitive conditions would thereby be destroyed. The only way to obviate that would be by uniform legislation in the States. I believe that this commission, for which we are appropriating so much money, should give to the country the utmost that it possibly can. We ought to get the most out of it that we possibly can. This amendment is not new matter. It is taken verbatim from the act of June 18, 1898, which created the Industrial Commission.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is there any other case where Congress has appointed a commission to formulate laws to be passed by the respective States?

Mr. ESCH. This is only a suggestion.

Mr. MANN. Have we ever before appointed a commission to suggest laws to be passed by the different States?

Mr. ESCH. I know of no other instance except the act creating the Industrial Commission, and it seems to me great good would be accomplished if this amendment were incorporated in the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it is practically impossible for any report of any Federal commission to be foisted upon any State as a basis for State legislation. The State exercises its own judgment.

I move, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] moves that all debate on this section and pending amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. The point of order is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, out of the time of the gentleman who offered an amendment, can not rise and obtain the floor and discuss the amendment, and then submit a motion to close debate and have it considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I hope I can be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. After this amendment is disposed of the gentleman can be recognized.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Is not the motion to close debate?

The CHAIRMAN. After this amendment is disposed of the motion to close debate will be in order.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. No; only to close debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto.

Mr. CANNON. This amendment ought to be disposed of before that.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not in order to present the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to close debate at the same time that the committee is going on to vote on a pending amendment. I ask recognition for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. May I ask how many amendments are expected to be proposed?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I have one amendment.

Mr. HOBSON. I have an amendment which I am willing to submit without discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair agreed to recognize the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] to offer his amendment after the disposition of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a motion pending offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] to close debate on this amendment and all amendments to this section.

Mr. MANN. I call the attention of the Chair to the rule of the House, paragraph 6 of Rule XXIII:

The committee may, by the vote of a majority of the Members present, at any time after the five minutes' debate has begun upon proposed amendments to any section or paragraph of a bill, close all debate upon such section or paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] to close all debate on this section——

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. And all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. And all amendments thereto.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. RODDENBERY) there were—ayes 56, noes 14.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and six Members, a quorum of the committee. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which the chairman of the Committee on Labor accepts.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, in line 12, after the semicolon following the word "therewith," add the following:

"Into the conditions of sanitation and safety of employees, and the provisions for protecting the life, limbs, and health of the employees."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 4, page 3, by inserting after the word "employees," in line 12, the following:

"To inquire into the effect on employer and employee of the importation and immigration of pauper labor from foreign countries, and especially the extent and effect of such importation and immigration since the report of the late immigration commission."

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I desire to submit a request.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that the gentleman has not offered his amendment at a place where there is any such word in the line. The Clerk read it—after the word "employees," in line 12.

There is no such word in line 12.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no word "employee" in line 12.

Mr. RODDENBERY. It should be line 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia says it should be line 10 instead of line 12.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address myself to the subject of this amendment for five minutes, and I ask unanimous consent for that opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania and other Members. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. HARDWICK. Who made the objection?

The CHAIRMAN. Several Members called for the regular order.

Mr. HARDWICK. No one stood up and objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again submit the request. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] asks unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, add a new section, section 5, as follows:

"SEC. 5. That a sum sufficient to carry out the provisions of this act, not to exceed $500,000, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, by direction of the committee, I offer the following substitute for the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the use of the commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913: Provided, That no portion of this money shall be paid except upon the order of said commission signed by the chairman thereof.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the substitute: "Provided, That no person employed hereunder by the commission shall be paid compensation at a rate in excess of $3,000 per annum."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to that.

The amendment to the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the adoption of the substitute as amended.

The substitute as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the several amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SULZER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 21094) to create a commission on industrial relations, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to its final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on each amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the Chair submitted the question if there was a separate vote demanded on any amendment and none was made, and that the Chair was about to put the question in gross. The gentleman from Georgia is too late.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I withdraw the demand, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit with instructions.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know if the gentleman from Georgia is opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Georgia opposed to the bill?

Mr. RODDENBERY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Is it necessary to be opposed to the bill in order to submit a motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. It is necessary for the Speaker to ascertain in order to give preference to some person who is opposed to it, provided there is any such person in the House.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Until such question arises, is it in order for a Member offering a motion to recommit to be called upon to state his position?

The SPEAKER. It is the duty of the Speaker to ask any person offering a motion to recommit if he is opposed to the bill.

Mr. RODDENBERY. The rules of the House, Mr. Speaker, require me to reverse my attitude on the bill; and I am opposed to it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RODDENBERY moves to recommit the bill to the committee with instructions that it report back forthwith the following amendment:

"Amend, section 4, page 3, by inserting after the word "employees," in line 10, the following: 'to inquire into the effect on employer and employee of the importation and immigration of pauper labor from foreign countries, and especially the extent and effect of such importation and immigration since the report of the late Immigration Commission.'"

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion is not in order in that it proposes an amendment that is not germane to the bill. There is nothing in the bill in reference to pauper labor or immigration, and it introduces an entirely new proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the motion to recommit is in order. Section 4 is very comprehensive.

The question is on the motion to recommit with instructions.

The question was taken, and the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on passing the bill as amended.

The question was taken, and the bill as amended was passed.

On motion of Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOUSTON rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up H. R. 18787.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit a conference report on the bill H. R. 19403, for printing under the rule.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think that had better go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to offer it only that it may be printed.

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman from Tennessee wait until the gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up his other bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, we have already had three days taken up by the Committee on Labor, and other matter is being crowded out. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker must rule according to the rules of the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 18787——

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Louisiana will wait until the gentleman from Pennsylvania states what he desires, the Chair will take up the question raised by the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 18787, relating to the limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics upon a public work of the United States and of the District of Columbia, and so forth.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If this bill is required to be considered in Committee of the Whole, would the calling of it up in the House at this time give consideration of it on next Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. It would not. The Chair looked up that very point with reference to what might have been raised as a point of order here to-day, and he might as well state his own conclusion now as at any other time. If the bill should get into the Committee of the Whole, and then the committee rise, even having been in session only half a minute, and report it back to the House, it would then be the unfinished business.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MANN. I think there is a quorum present. The friends of labor will vote that motion down.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw that demand and ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to adjourn, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania demands a division.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 78, noes 61.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the yeas and nays. Those who favor ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Forty-three gentlemen have risen, a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered. The question is on the motion to adjourn, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MANN. And the friends of labor will vote "no."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 20, nays 175, answered "present" 9, not voting 185, as follows:

Mr. SISSON. I was not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and I desire to withdraw my vote of "no" and answer "present."

The SPEAKER. Call the gentleman's name.

The name of Mr. MANN was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

LIMITATION OF DAILY SERVICE OF LABORERS AND MECHANICS.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 18787.

The SPEAKER. The House resolves itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 18787, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] will take the chair.

Mr. CLAYTON took the chair amid applause.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 18787, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18787) relating to the limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon a public work of the United States and of the District of Columbia, and of all persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States and of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CLAYTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 18787) relating to the limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon a public work of the United States and of the District of Columbia, and of all persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States and of the District of Columbia, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for four days, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, July 18, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

I., by public auction, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1016), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 25751) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report

(No. 1012), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 4838) to amend section 96 of the "act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1013), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 25520) to amend section 107 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1014), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. STERLING, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 25780) to amend section 3186 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1018), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 24739) to reinstate Robert N. Campbell as a first lieutenant in the Coast Artillery Corps, United States Army, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1011), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were thereupon referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13283) granting a pension to Catherine Hudson; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 15108) granting a pension to Lizzie M. O'Sullivan; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 16764) granting a pension to Niels Pederson; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 17818) granting a pension to John E. Smith; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 18180) granting a pension to James B. Mulford; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 22384) granting a pension to Mary B. Guillow; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BLACKMON: A bill (H. R. 25803) to define and punish perjury in oaths used in the land offices of the United States of America; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 18, 1912.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on the request of Mr. LODGE and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 21094) to create a Commission on Industrial Relations, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3815) to amend an act entitled "An act to require apparatus and operators for radio communication on certain ocean steamers," approved June 24, 1910.

The message further requested the Senate to furnish the House with a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 2748) for the relief of Clara Dougherty, Ernest Kubel, and Josephine Taylor, owners of lot No. 13; of Ernest Kubel, owner of lot No. 41; and of Mary Meder, owner of the south 17.10 feet front by the full depth thereof of lot No. 14, all of said property in square No. 774, in Washington, D. C., with regard to assessment and payment for damages on account of change of grade due to the construction of Union Station in said District, the original having been lost or mislaid. (H. Res. 634.)

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. GALLINGER) presented a resolution adopted by the Wholesale Grass Seed Dealers' Association Convention, held at Chicago, Ill., June 25, 1912, favoring the enactment of legislation to prohibit the admission of certain adulterated seeds and seeds unfit for seeding purposes without the proposed Senate amendment to section 4, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PERKINS. I present a large number of petitions in the forms of telegrams signed by 800 members of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco and other representative citizens of California, praying that legislation as to tolls on American vessels passing through the Panama Canal shall be such as to insure free competition, and remonstrating against any action which would limit an American vessel, irrespective of ownership, in the amount of coastwise cargo she can carry when engaged in transoceanic trade, and declaring dangerous and unjust the concluding provision of paragraph 1, section 11, of the canal bill, which reads as follows:

That no such railroad owned or controlled ship shall pass through the canal unless at least 50 per cent of its cargo, in tonnage, is destined to or shipped from oriental or European ports.

I move that the petitions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I present resolutions adopted by members of the Mohave County Medical Society, of Arizona, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KINGMAN, ARIZ., May 30, 1912.

To Hon. MARCUS A. SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

At a meeting of the Mohave County Medical Society, held on May 28, 1912, the following resolutions were adopted and are respectfully submitted:

Whereas Senate bill No. 1, known as the Owen bill, is soon to be voted upon; and

Whereas a very large proportion of the deaths throughout the country are due to preventable causes, a condition that is a disgrace to modern civilization, and needs corrective measures; a country's most valuable asset is the health of its citizens, and its most important product is its children; therefore does it behoove us to see that the health of our citizens is maintained and our children given their rightful energies by means of sanitary conditions;

Whereas it has been fully demonstrated that preventive medicine has made it possible to save lives by organized and coherent efforts, such as the world has witnessed in Cuba and the Panama Canal Zone, without which organization such efforts would have been futile. We believe that this stands as an example of what could be expected within our borders, by limiting preventable diseases if the efforts of our physicians were directed by proper organization such as the Owen bill contemplates;

Whereas our Government has appropriated vast sums of money for curtailing diseases among horses, cattle, hogs, and plants, and no adequate sum for the conservation of the health of its citizens; and

Whereas the opponents of the Owen bill have claimed that the intent of the measure is to make a "medical trust" which will preclude a citizen from employing a medical advisor of choice; we refute this argument of the patent medicine vendors and of those sects professing to heal, who have no knowledge of sanitary conditions, and will not report contagious diseases as set forth in our health laws. And inasmuch as the object of this bill is to prevent disease and is of a strictly sanitary nature, without any reference whatever to the treatment of disease, it is evident that their argument is selfish, and purely mercenary without any idea of public welfare: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Mohave County Medical Society petition the honorable Senators for the State of Arizona to give the Owen bill their most hearty support.

W. H. BUCHER, M. D., President.
A. M. COWIE, M. D., Secretary.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a petition of members of the Wholesale Grocers' Association of Jacksonville, Fla., praying for the passage of the so-called weight or measure branding bill, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of Columbian Division, No. 519, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Chicago, Ill., and a petition of the Illinois State Legislative Board, praying for the enactment of legislation granting to the publications of fraternal associations the privileges of second-class mail matter, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of sundry employees of the National Printing & Publishing Co., of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to increase the postal rates on printed matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Proviso, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the use of insignia or garb of any denomination in the Indian public schools, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PENROSE presented resolutions adopted by members of the Aero Club of Pennsylvania, favoring the enactment of legislation for the regulation and control of the navigation of the air by all forms of air craft and for the issuance of licenses under governmental supervision, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a memorial of the Record Publishing Co., of Derry, N. H., and a memorial of the Inquirer Job Printing Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio, remonstrating against the establishment of a parcel-post system, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of members of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to define and punish contempt of court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WORKS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 23043) to patent certain semiarid lands to Luther Burbank under certain conditions, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 944) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 5068) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange lands for school sections within an Indian, military, national forest, or other reservation, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 945) thereon.

Mr. HEYBURN. In regard to the last bill reported by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], I would not like to have it appear that it is a unanimous report. I may file a report on behalf of those members of the committee who do not agree to the bill.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred S. Res. No. 356, submitted by Mr. SMITH of Michigan on the 13th instant, providing for the printing of 18,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 806, Sixty-second Congress, second session, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4512) for the relief of Mary Beal, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 946) thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 6763) to authorize the cities of Bangor and Brewer, Me., to construct or reconstruct, wholly or in part, and maintain and operate a bridge across the Penobscot River, between said cities, without a draw, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 947) thereon.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 7252) to amend section 107 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, reported it without amendment.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 21963) to make Fort Covington, N. Y., a subport of entry, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 948) thereon.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11149) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the city of Sulphur Springs, Tex., certain land for street purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 949) thereon.

IMMIGRATION STATION AT HAMPTON ROADS, VA.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Immigration I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 7130) to provide for the establishment of an immigration station at Hampton Roads, in the State of Virginia, and the erection of a public building on a site to be selected for said station. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CULBERSON. I did not hear the amount appropriated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. SWANSON. It will be covered by the immigrant fund.

Mr. LODGE. It is the same amount that was used for the establishment of an immigrant station at Baltimore and at New Orleans. There is no doubt that we need this station at Hampton Roads. The bill should be amended to remove it from the immigrant fund, because that no longer exists.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill, but did I understand that the money is to be paid out of the immigrant fund?

Mr. LODGE. The immigrant fund was abolished some years ago.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I understood.

Mr. LODGE. It is to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that the immigrant fund is now covered into the Treasury.

Mr. LODGE. It is now covered into the Treasury.

Mr. WARREN. Reserving the right to object if the bill leads to any debate, I will consent to its consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were, in line 10, after the word "appropriated," to insert the words "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated"; in line 11 to strike out the words "which sum shall be paid from the immigrant fund" and insert "and"; and after the word "sum," in line 12, to strike out the word "to" and insert "shall," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to establish an immigration station at Hampton Roads, in the State of Virginia, and to cause to be erected, on a site to be selected, a public building to temporarily accommodate and care for immigrants arriving at said place.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $250,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the erection of said building, and said sum shall include purchase of land and dock room necessary for said station and building, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IRRIGATION DITCH IN HAWAII.

Mr. CLAPP. Some weeks ago the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico reported the bill (H. R. 11628) authorizing John T. McCrosson and associates to construct an irrigation ditch on the island of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii. The bill was brought up for passage and read. It was objected to in its then form by the junior Senator from the State of Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. The bill has been referred back to the committee and the objections of the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Kansas have been considered and met.

I report the bill back with an amendment and ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment was, on page 9, line 9, after the word "revenues," to insert the words "in connection with all other revenues of the company."

Mr. STONE. What does the bill accomplish?

Mr. CLAPP. It is a bill to authorize an irrigation project in Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii. The bill was reported and brought up for consideration and read, and the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Kansas objected to the form of it. It was referred back to the committee. Their objections were considered and met by the amendment which has been offered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

THE "TITANIC" DISASTER.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Printing I report back Senate resolution 355, submitted by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] on the 13th instant, with an amendment to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert a substitute. I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That 500 additional copies of Senate Document No. 726, Sixty-second Congress, second session, Hearings on the Titanic Disaster, be printed for the use of the Senate folding room.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORT FAIRFIELD, ME.

Mr. SWANSON. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 6596) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon in the town of Fort Fairfield, in the State of Maine (S. Rept. 943), and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not think we ought to transact all our business in the morning hour. I shall not object to the consideration of this bill, but I will feel constrained to object to the continuous passage of bills in the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post office and customhouse, in the town of Fort Fairchild, county of Aroostook, State of Maine, the cost of said site and building, including the abovementioned apparatus, not to exceed the sum of $60,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CULBERSON:

A bill (S. 7328) granting an increase of pension to Charlotte R. Wynne (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 7329) for the relief of Job S. Beals; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 7330) for the relief of James Boyle, alias James Black; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 7331) granting a pension to James Murphy; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MARTIN of Virginia:

A bill (S. 7332) granting a pension to R. H. Catlett (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GUGGENHEIM:

A bill (S. 7333) granting an increase of pension to George W. Cook; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHIVELY:

A bill (S. 7334) for the relief of Elijah Watts (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 7335) for the relief of James D. Butler (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL (H. R. 25069).

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 for additional cost of the post-office building at Albany, Oreg., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan submitted an amendment providing that all persons employed in or under the Bureau of Lighthouses upon work relating to the establishment of changes in aids to navigation shall have had at least three years' actual service afloat in the handling and piloting of vessels, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, ordered to lie on the table.

He also submitted an amendment providing that retired officers of the Navy shall be eligible for appointment as lighthouse inspectors, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. POMERENE. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table, and for the information of the Senate I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed, to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. POMERENE to the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

On page 101, after line 5, insert the following:

"PENSION BUREAU.

"Three hundred thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary to employ, temporarily, extra clerks by the Commissioner of Pensions to aid him in the work incident to the adjudication of pension claims filed under the act entitled 'An act granting a service pension to certain defined veterans of the Civil War and the War with Mexico,' approved May 11, 1912, at salaries not to exceed $1,200 each; and in order to facilitate said work the Commissioner of Pensions is authorized to employ clerks heretofore employed in other departments of the Government service, or others who may be sufficiently skilled to do the required work, without complying with the requirements of the civil-service laws: Provided, however, That none of said extra clerks shall continue in the service beyond the fiscal year of this appropriation without further legislation, or, by reason of said employment alone, be eligible for transfer to the service in other departments, or be continued longer than may be necessary to do the work hereby provided for."

Mr. SHIVELY. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which I ask to have printed, printed in the RECORD, and that it lie on the table.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed, to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. SHIVELY to the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, viz:

On page 98, after line 5, insert the following:

"Provided, That no allowance or disallowance heretofore made shall preclude an officer or enlisted man of the United States or Volunteer Army, or his next of kin or personal representative, from applying for and receiving any pay and allowances which may be due him under a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States or under a decision of the Court of Claims where no appeal is taken therefrom: And provided further, That in the settlement of claims for pay and allowances on account of services of commissioned officers in the volunteers or militia during the Civil War the accounting officers of the Treasury shall credit as service in the Army of the United States within the meaning of the Army pay laws all service rendered from date of enrollment to date of muster as of the grade stated opposite the officer's name on the muster rolls: And provided further, That in cases where such officer was duly promoted and appointed to fill a vacancy due to a casualty of the service at any time during the Civil War his pay shall be held to commence from the date his predecessor's pay ceased, provided it be shown by the records or other satisfactory evidence that service was rendered by such officer for which no payment has been made, or that service was rendered in a higher grade than paid for, and that such officer was present with his command during the time for which pay is claimed, or, if absent, that such absence was caused by disability or capture by the enemy; all payments made as of any lower grade to be deducted, and all laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed."

PUBLICITY OF CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. BORAH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 23349) providing for publicity of contributions and expenditures for the purpose of influencing or securing the nomination of candidates for the offices of President and Vice President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—JOSEPHUS EWING.

On motion of Mr. GUGGENHEIM, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying S. 5297, Sixty-second Congress, second session, granting an increase of pension to Josephus Ewing, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—GEORGE MILLHOLLAND.

On motion of Mr. SHIVELY, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill granting an increase of pension to George Millholland, S. 538, Sixty-second Congress, first session, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—EMMA D. M'MANUS.

On motion of Mr. SHIVELY, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill granting an increase of pension to Emma D. McManus, S. 3078, Sixty-second Congress, first session, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

METROPOLITAN COACH CO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2904) to confer upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia authority to regulate the operation and equipment of vehicles of the Metropolitan Coach Co.

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives, ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes, and the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. JONES, Mr. KENYON, and Mr. PAYNTER conferees on the part of the Senate.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business?

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. WARREN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the Senate proceed——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business has not yet closed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Chair announced that the morning business was concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there concurrent or other resolutions?

[Mr. MARTIN of Virginia submitted a report from the Committee on Claims and one from the Committee on Commerce, which appear under their appropriate heading.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If not, the morning business is closed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. I move to take up House bill 25069, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of House bill 25069, the sundry civil appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. WARREN. I move, then, that the bill be taken up.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the motion. The Senator from Wyoming moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SIMMONS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays. I wish to call up the wool bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I do not see that Senator in the Chamber, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. I do not know how he would vote. If he were present I would vote "yea."

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. FOSTER's name was called). I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER] on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. HEYBURN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I do not see him in the Chamber. I will therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SANDERS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], and will therefore not vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY], and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LIPPITT. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. If he were here and I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WETMORE (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I voted inadvertently, not noticing his absence, and therefore I will withdraw my vote.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HEYBURN. I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BRADLEY. I desire to transfer my pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] to the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BRANDEGEE (after having voted in the affirmative). When I voted I did not notice the absence from the floor of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I am paired with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. BRIGGS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WATSON]. As he has not voted, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am requested to announce the pair existing between the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. I desire this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN]. I make this announcement for the day.

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 27, as follows:

So Mr. WARREN's motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if I have kept a right account, the reading of the bill on yesterday proceeded to the top of page 74. I inquire if that is correct?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is so informed. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill at that point.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, this bill contains 200 pages and carries appropriations aggregating $115,000,000, or about that amount. I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the remainder of the bill without the formal reading and that the amendments of the committee may be considered as we proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the further formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with.

Mr. SIMMONS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina objects. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill at the point reached on yesterday.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, beginning with line 1, page 74, and continued down to the end of line 16, on page 91.

Mr. REED. I have been trying to follow the reading of the bill, but it is so rapid and so informal that I can not understand it well enough to follow the text. I should like to inquire where the clerk is reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk has reached page 91, line 17, the Chair is informed.

Mr. REED. I should like to have the bill read so that I can follow the reading.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 21, on page 106, the last paragraph read proposing to appropriate $20,000 for the opening of Indian reservations.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HEYBURN. At what stage will an amendment be appropriate to the portion of the bill just read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that after the reading of the bill has been completed, the reading proceeding for the purpose of information to the Senate, that presumably the committee amendments will first be considered, and then amendments from the floor will be in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. As in Committee of the Whole?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely wanted the RECORD at this point to show that the inquiry was made and answered by the Chair.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Chair states that presumably the committee amendments will first be considered. Does the Chair mean to say by that that there has been any agreement or arrangement to that effect?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not so far as the Chair is concerned. The Chair simply states what is the usual custom of the Senate.

Mr. REED. My reason for the inquiry was the remark of the Senator that he was making the inquiry now in order that there might be a record; and I would not want to have it go by common consent that that is to be the method. I think it may become important in the consideration of this bill whether we are to proceed that way or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator that no agreement has been made nor has any suggestion been made to the Chair.

Mr. REED. So, it is clear.

Mr. HEYBURN. It may be proper for me to state that I made the inquiry in view of the fact that the chairman of the committee renewed his request this morning with reference to the consideration of committee amendments and asked for unanimous consent; and I thought it right that this proceeding should contain some record of the fact that we were proceeding under that order or rule of business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will continue.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, and read to page 121, line 5.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I make the point that there is no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cullom	McCumber	Shively
Bacon	Cummins	McLean	Smith, Mich.
Borah	Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Smoot
Bourne	du Pont	Martine, N. J.	Stephenson
Bradley	Fall	Massey	Sutherland
Brandegee	Fletcher	Nelson	Swanson
Briggs	Gallinger	Newlands	Thornton
Bryan	Gamble	Overman	Tillman
Burnham	Gronna	Page	Townsend
Catron	Heyburn	Percy	Warren
Clapp	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Poindexter	Works
Crane	Kenyon	Pomerene
Crawford	La Follette	Root
Culberson	Lodge	Sanders

Mr. SHIVELY. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. KERN] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber, and that he is paired with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS]. I wish this statement to stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, at page 121, line 6, and read to page 161, line 11.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside that the pending appropriation bill may be proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina objects, and the unfinished business is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a day or two ago in the discussion of this bill the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] in giving his views as to the construction of the treaty and the consequences involved in a possible award of The Hague tribunal against the construction advocated by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], stated that if the decision of The Hague tribunal should be against the contention that we could exempt our domestic coastwise shipping from tolls then we would be under obligation to repay to the foreign ships from which we had collected it all the tolls collected during the time between the opening of the canal and the decision. The question was raised, I think, by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] as to the possible amount of those tolls. There was no definite information in the testimony at that time about it, although the special commissioner appointed by the President in relation to matters concerning the Panama Canal had estimated that in round numbers in 1915 the total annual tonnage through the canal would be something like 10,250,000 tons. Of course at a dollar a ton, which has been the rate that has been most talked about as being a fair rate, that would be a collection of ten and a quarter million dollars in tolls from vessels passing through the canal in that year.

In view of the fact that there was no more definite estimate than that, and from that statement of Prof. Johnson it was not clear what portion of the total tonnage estimated would be domestic or port to port, sometimes called coastwise tonnage, and what proportion of that tonnage would come from the vessels of foreign nations, I asked him to give me the figures separately, and I send——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator excuse me just a moment? I send to the desk and ask that the Secretary may read the inclosed letter just received from him and also the table which he has prepared, after the Senator from Florida has asked the question that he desires to ask.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to ask the Senator in this connection what is the estimate as to the cost of maintenance of the canal. I understand the tolls to be estimated at something like ten million and a quarter a year. Outside of any question of interest on the money invested there, I should like to inquire what estimate there is as to the actual expense of maintenance.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will give the Senator those figures as soon as this letter has been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSION,
Washington Office, July 17, 1912.

Senator FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BRANDEGEE: I inclose a memorandum separating into three divisions the estimated tonnage of shipping that will use the Panama Canal in 1915, 1920, and 1925. The tonnage for each year is divided into (1) American shipping employed through the canal in the coastwise trade, (2) American shipping employed in carrying through the canal foreign commmerce of the United States, and (3) foreign shipping using the canal to carry the foreign commerce of the United States and the commerce of foreign countries with each other.

It will be seen from the memorandum that about four-fifths of the tonnage of the ships using the Panama Canal will be under foreign flags.

Very truly, yours, EMORY R. JOHNSON.

Classification of estimated shipping using the Panama Canal in 1915, 1920, and 1925.

	1915	1920	1925
Coast-to-coast American shipping	1,000,000	1,414,000	2,000,000
American shipping carrying foreign commerce of the United States	715,000	905,000	1,150,000
Foreign shipping carrying commerce of the United States and foreign countries	8,785,000	11,025,000	13,850,000
Total	10,500,000	13,344,000	17,000,000

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he is advised upon what authentic data the author of this letter predicates that table. Is it a mere estimate, a mere guess, or has he something tangible upon which to make the estimate?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think that is a very pertinent inquiry, Mr. President. The fact is that this gentleman, who is especially competent as an investigator along these lines as a political economist and expert on trade conditions, occupies a chair in the University of Pennsylvania. He is the same Dr. Johnson who was employed by the Canal Commission some years ago, who investigated the same matters contained in his present report and who brought them down to 1909, perhaps. I think that was the date. It may have been 1905. At any rate the President appointed him to carry on his work and bring it down to date.

I do not think that the estimates are mere guesses. Of course they are estimates of conditions that have not yet arisen, and of course are not pretended to be anything more than his conclusions from all the evidence that he could get access to. He has made——

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will pardon me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. Does Dr. Johnson undertake to inform the chairman of the committee as to the sources of information upon which he predicates this table?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When the Senator asked his last question I was about to say that his estimates are based upon exhaustive investigations both here and in the commercial centers and seaports of the world as to the actual movements of vessels during long periods of time in the past and as to the present use of the Suez Canal. All the facts and figures that can be shown with regard to the amount of business the Suez Canal had when it was first opened, the percentage of the ocean-borne commerce that was done by steam vessels as compared with that done by sailing vessels, the increase from year to year of the tonnage through the canal and the comparison of that tonnage with the tonnage through all the other canals of the world, the rates of toll charged when the Suez Canal was opened and the estimates and expectations that were held by experts at that time as to what that traffic would develop—all those things have been methodically compiled. The entire report has not yet been completed or printed. It was designed, in my opinion, not so much for the use of Congress—because at that time I do not think it was expected that Congress would attempt to fix the tolls—but it was designed, I assume, for the use of the President or the commission to which Congress was expected to delegate the duty of fixing the tolls.

So I say the entire completed work of the professor is not available for Congress at present, but realizing that the discussion would necessitate the results of his investigation upon certain features of his report, he has taken the liberty to publish in advance of his entire report certain chapters of his report, which will later be made to Congress or the President, I do not remember which. Those have been forwarded to me and have been heretofore printed as a Senate document and laid upon the desk of every Senator and are in the document room. Anyone who reads either or both of them will see that the investigation has been exceedingly thorough. But like every other matter that is not yet determined into actuality it is simply his best judgment upon his investigations. Of course, no more importance will attach to it than to the investigation of any other skilled scholar having all the knowledge available upon the subject.

In answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], I read now from page 10 of the minority views of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the House, which cites the majority report. It states not as a citation, but in reference to it, as follows:

> The careful and detailed estimates of Col. Goethals show that the total annual cost of the operation and maintenance of the canal, including the cost of sanitation and civil government, will not exceed $4,000,000, and that it is hoped to realize a profit from the sale of supplies, etc., to bring this down to $3,500,000. (See committee hearings, pp. 410, 411, 415, and 417.)

Of course, those are the House hearings.

> Analyzing the figures of Prof. Johnson, we find that a toll of $1 per net register ton would bring in a total annual revenue during the first year, exclusive of passenger tolls, of $10,500,000. Subtracting the interstate-commerce traffic (American coastwise), which Prof. Johnson estimates at 1,160,000 tons, we would still have an annual revenue of $9,340,000, more than double the operating expenses, with the tonnage annually increasing.

Does that answer the question of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FLETCHER. That answers the question, Mr. President. I did not know but that the Senator might have some other figures than these. I read this report, but I did not know but that the Senator's investigation might have caused him to reach a different conclusion as to these estimates.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No, Mr. President. The testimony of Col. Goethals both on the Isthmus before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and before the same committee here was to that effect. I simply read it from that document because I found it more accessible than the other. I could not take it from the other without hunting through the index.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Those figures do not include the cost of military occupation, I assume.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no; it says simply the cost of operating the locks, putting vessels through, and the cost of the necessary sanitation on that portion of the zone which will need to be sanitated.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand that it does include the cost of civil government there.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But not military.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The cost of civil government of course will be very light after the locks of the canal are in operation, unless it should be the policy of Congress to induce immigration into the zone and try to settle it up. The opinion of the War Department and of Col. Goethals and, I think, of a majority of the Senate committee was that it would be the wisest policy not to attempt to settle up that zone, which was acquired primarily for canal purposes, but to denude it so far as possible of settlers; and that then there would be less danger from disease, less danger from public enemies, and less cost to the Government to operate. But that is a separate question. I do not care, unless the Senator wants me to do so, to enter upon the discussion of that feature of it at this time.

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. STONE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri. I did not see that the Senator from Iowa had risen.

Mr. STONE. Oh, no; let the Senator from Iowa proceed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I will yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was called from the Chamber and just a moment ago returned as the Senator from Connecticut was stating the probable revenue. I only want to ask whether the revenue is estimated on the basis of $1 for a net registered ton?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes. I will state for the information of the Senator that I was reading an extract from the views of the minority of the committee in the House, and it was based, as the Senator says, upon the assumed arbitrary unit of $1 per net registered ton.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. Did I understand the Senator from Connecticut in his last statement to quote from some estimate that the revenue to be derived from the canal the first year would approximate $10,000,000?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes, Mr. President; that was the statement contained in the minority report of the House committee based upon the statement of Prof. Johnson, to whom I have referred. It was that, in his opinion, in 1915, the first year of the opening and operation of the canal, there would be—I see the exact figure is 10,500,000 net registered tons of domestic and foreign commerce going through the canal; and if we collect a toll of $1 per net registered ton it would equal ten and a half million dollars as the total amount of receipts from tolls on vessels passing through the canal.

Mr. STONE. Is not that higher in 1915 than the estimate given in the statement accompanying the letter which the Senator just had read from the Clerk's desk?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I could not tell the Senator. He can ask the Secretary to read the statement of Prof. Johnson again.

Mr. STONE. I looked at it a moment ago.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The statement I sent to the desk is dated as of to-day. The other statement was made several weeks, if not months, ago, and it may be that Prof. Johnson has modified his view since then.

Mr. STONE. Somewhat; not very much.

I wish to call attention to this fact: If the estimates made by Dr. Johnson are reliable, then what I am about to call attention to is a fact. We have had some discussion here, particularly from the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], who led off in it—and I think his view was concurred in by others—that if free tolls so-called should be admitted to American vessels passing through the canal, and the question raised by that should be referred to The Hague court and decided against us, we would have to refund to vessels of other countries passing through the canal in the interval between the opening and the decision of the court whatever had been collected. There was a question raised before the Senate as to the probable amount that would have to be refunded, if refunded at all. I think the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] suggested that it would exceed $15,000,000 or $20,000,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. I said $15,000,000 to $25,000,000.

Mr. STONE. Between $15,000,000 and $25,000,000. The Senator from New York insisted that a hearing of this importance between these two great nations and a controversy of this character before that court would probably require 5 to 10 years in its consideration before the decision should be reached. Now, if Prof. Johnson's estimate is correct, it will be much more than that and much more than the amount suggested by the Senator from Iowa. It is important to know, therefore, something about the accuracy of this estimate in that view of the case.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Just a moment, if the Senator pleases. I took the table a moment ago and attempted to strike an average between the extremes; that is to say, an average between the estimated revenue to be received in 1915 and the estimated revenue to be received in 1925, covering a period of 10 years, and the average, as I make it (I am certainly approximately correct), would be $10,200,000 annually. If it would require five years to dispose of this arbitration before the court at The Hague tolls would have been collected amounting to $51,000,000. I suppose from that ought to be deducted the amount contained in the table, as the amount that would be collected from American vessels going through, with the tolls imposed upon them as upon foreign vessels, but that is comparatively small, as stated by Dr. Johnson. The amount we would have to refund at the end of five years, if that estimate is correct, would be in the neighborhood of $45,000,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. In making the estimate I did not give full reliance to the estimate of Dr. Johnson. I think he is rather sanguine with regard to the volume of business that will pass through the canal in the next five years. I also, as the Senator from Missouri will remember, said that controversy, if it goes to The Hague, to which I do not agree, should be settled within from three to five years, and that therefore, in my opinion, the extreme amount we would be called upon to pay would be more than $25,000,000.

Of course it is a mere estimate. Nobody can tell what volume of business will pass through this canal, as I will endeavor to show when I come to consider the question of tolls. It depends entirely upon the action of our competitors as to what business will pass through the canal.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to present and move the adoption of the conference report on the river and harbor bill, and if it is necessary to make a request in connection with it, I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. LODGE. That is not necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of Michigan in the chair). The Senator from Minnesota presents a conference report, which will be read by the Secretary.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 21477) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 6, 12, 28, 35, 93, 105, 106, 107, 156, 183, 184, 185, 186, 188.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 7, 9, 10, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 23, 25, 26, 27, 29, 31, 32, 33, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 43, 45, 46, 47, 48, 53, 54, 55, 56, 58, 59, 62, 63, 64, 65, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 73, 74, 77, 79, 81, 82, 83, 84, 87, 88, 89, 90, 92, 94, 95, 98, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 117, 118, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 154, 155, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 178, 179, 181, 187; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "Improving Pollock Rip Channel through the shoals lying near the entrance to Nantucket Sound, Mass., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 536, Sixty-second Congress, second session, $125,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 8: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the proposed amendment strike out the words "five hundred thousand dollars" and insert in lieu thereof the words "three hundred thousand dollars"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 13: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the proposed amendment strike out the words "five hundred thousand" and insert in lieu there of the words "three hundred thousand"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the proviso contained in the proposed amendment insert the following: "Provided, That the land required for making said cut-offs, or easements therein, shall be furnished free of cost to the United States, and the United States shall be released from all claims for damages arising from the proposed diversion of the stream"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 21: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed, insert the following: "Improving Elk and Little Elk Rivers, Md.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 770, Sixty-second Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $4,040"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 22: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "Provided, That the provisions of section 11 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899, are hereby made applicable to the Potomac and Anacostia Rivers, and hereafter harbor lines in the District of Columbia, or elsewhere on said rivers, shall be established or modified as therein provided; and all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with this proviso are hereby repealed: Provided further, That hereafter the officer in local charge of the improvement shall have authority, with approval of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, when no public building is available, to rent suitable offices, to be paid for pro rata from the appropriations for works in his charge: And provided further, That the proviso in the act of June 3, 1896, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes,' under the item 'Improving Potomac River, Washington, D. C.' is hereby repealed"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: ", printed in House Document No. 589, Sixty-second Congress, second session, and the foregoing appropriation shall be devoted to that purpose; for the improvement and maintenance of said inland waterway, $100,000; in all, $600,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 30: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 30, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the proposed amendment strike out the words "six months from the date of the approval of this act," and insert in lieu thereof the words "one year from February 27, 1912"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 37: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "That the provision in the river and harbor act approved March 3, 1905 (33 Stat., p. 1128), granting Louis M. Tisdale the right and authority to construct and operate a channel through Mobile Bay, and to construct and maintain wharves, piers, anchorage and turning basins, and other similar structures in said bay, is hereby revived and reenacted: Provided, That the said provision is hereby so amended as to vest in the South Mobile Terminal Co., its successors and assigns, all the rights, privileges, and authority thereby granted to the said Louis M. Tisdale, subject to all the terms and conditions of said act, upon full and complete assignment and transfer of all such rights, privileges, and authority of said Tisdale to the said South Mobile Terminal Co.: Provided also, That the said provision is hereby further amended so as to extend the time for completing the work therein authorized for a period of five years from the approval of this act: And provided also, That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act, in so far as it relates to this franchise, is hereby expressly reserved"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 39: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: ", of which amount $120,000 may be applied to the purchase or construction of a suitable dredging plant: Provided, That the U. S. dredge Barnard may be transferred back to the improvement from which it was transferred by act approved February 27, 1911, and the balance remaining on hand of the $60,000 authorized by the act of February 27, 1911, to be expended for the repair and modification of the U. S. dredge Barnard, may be expended for the purchase or construction of the dredging plant herein authorized"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 41: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "The Secretary of War may appoint a board of three engineer officers whose duty it shall be to examine and report upon the following harbors and channels in Texas, at or near Galveston, to wit: Galveston Harbor and Channel, Texas City Harbor and Channel, Port Bolivar Harbor and Port Bolivar Channel leading thereto, all with a view to securing a depth of 35 feet"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 44: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language stricken out insert the following: "And the said board shall also report whether the waters lying between Harbor Island and the mainland may be exempted from the operation of the laws relating to navigable waterways of the United States"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendments numbered 49, 50, 51, 52: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 49, 50, 51, 52, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of all the words contained in this paragraph, after the words "heretofore authorized," insert the following: ", and for an accurate instrumental survey of the river as recommended in the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1911, $425,000; continuing improvement and for maintenance by open channel work, $15,000; in all, $440,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 57: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language of the proposed amendment insert the following: "For improving the Arkansas River, in Arkansas: For protecting the north bank thereof, in the bend in front of the Crawford County Levee, south of Van Buren, in sections 8, 9, and 10 in township 8 north, range 30 west, which shall be considered extraordinary emergency work, $30,000. This appropriation shall be expended as soon as practicable in accordance with plans to be prepared by the Chief of Engineers of the War Department"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 60: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "Improving Ohio River: For the raising and strengthening of the levees in the city of Cairo, Ill., on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, and in the Cairo drainage district, which shall be considered extraordinary emergency work, $250,000: Provided, That the city of Cairo shall expend, or cause to be expended, the same amount for the same purpose"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 61: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "For the raising and strengthening of the levees in the city of Mound City, Ill., on the Ohio River, which shall be considered extraordinary emergency work, $20,000 on the condition that the city of Mound City shall furnish an equal amount for the same purpose"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 66: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 66, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the word "three"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 72: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 72, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "That in view of the existing emergency $4,000,000 of the money hereby appropriated is set apart for the repair and construction of levees"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 75: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 75, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "The traveling expenses of the civilian members of the Mississippi River Commission, and of the Assistant Engineer of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, when on duty, shall be computed and paid in the same way as the traveling expenses of the Army members of said commission, and of said board"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 76: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 76, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the proposed amendment strike out the words "Bayou Sara" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Baton Rouge, La., and between Bessie, Lake County, Tenn., and Memphis, Tenn.," and strike out the words "twenty thousand" and insert in lieu thereof the words "thirty thousand"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 78: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 78, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "Provided, That cooperation from the localities benefited may be required in the prosecution of the said project in case any comprehensive plan is hereafter adopted by Congress for an apportionment of expense generally applicable to river and other projects in which any improvement now or hereafter adopted confers special or exceptional benefit upon the localities affected: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall postpone the expenditure of the amount hereby appropriated or any further appropriation for said project without action by Congress"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 80: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 80, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the proposed amendment strike out the word "eighty-five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-five"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 85: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 85, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "Improving Stockton Harbor, San Joaquin River, Cal., by dredging McLeod Lake and Fremont Channel, with a view to securing a permanent channel depth of 9 feet, in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 581, Sixty-second Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $11,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 86: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 86, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "Improving Tillamook Bay and Bar, Oreg.: For maintenance, $5,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 91: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 91, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the proposed amendment strike out the word "eight" and insert in lieu thereof the word "seven"; and after the word "dollars," in the next line, add the following: "And the Secretary of War shall submit a report whether any saving can be effected, and, if so, how much, by a more rapid prosecution of this improvement"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 97: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 97, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "SEC. 7. Unless otherwise expressed, the channel depths referred to in this act shall be understood to signify the depth at mean low water in tidal waters, and the mean depth during the month of lowest water in the navigation season in rivers and nontidal channels; and the channel widths specified shall be understood to admit of such increase in width at the entrances, bends, sidings, and turning places as may be necessary to allow of the free movement of boats." And transfer the paragraph to page 62, immediately after section 6; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 99: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 99, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Before the word "Whenever," in line 1 of the proposed amendment, insert "Sec. 8." and transfer the paragraph as thus amended to its proper place at the end of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 100: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 100, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Before the first word of the proposed amendment insert "Sec. 9." and transfer the paragraph as thus amended to its proper place at the end of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 101: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 101, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Before the first word of the proposed amendment insert "Sec. 10." and transfer the paragraph as thus amended to its proper place at the end of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 102: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 102, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert on page 60, in line 17, after the word "survey," the following: ": Provided further, That the Chief of Engineers may, at his discretion, increase to not to exceed nine the number of engineer officers constituting said board: And provided further, That a majority of said board shall be of rank not less than lieutenant colonel"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 103: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 103, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Before the first word of the proposed amendment insert "Sec. 11." and transfer the paragraph as thus amended to its proper place at the end of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 104: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 104, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "SEC. 12. In order to make possible the economical future development of water power the Secretary of War, upon recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to provide in the permanent parts of any dam authorized at any time by Congress for the improvement of navigation such foundations, sluices, and other works, as may be considered desirable for the future development of its water power." And transfer the paragraph as thus amended to its proper place at the end of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 113: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 113, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "Buffalo Harbor, N. Y., with a view to increasing the width of the entrance of the inner harbor to 400 feet by removing the Government south pier at the mouth of Buffalo River; also with a view to increasing the width of Black Rock Harbor and the entrances thereto," and transfer the same to page 45, preceding line 1; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 114: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 114, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of this amendment, after the word "River," insert the word "Connecticut," and transfer said amendment to page 44, after line 24; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 115: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 115, and agree to the same with the following amendment: In line 2 of said amendment, after the word "thereof," insert a period and strike out the balance of the amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 116: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 116, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "Salmon River, N. Y., at and below Fort Covington"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 119: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 119, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "That a preliminary investigation be made to determine whether a system of impounding reservoirs at the headwaters of the Allegheny, Monongahela, and Ohio Rivers and their tributaries is needed and practicable to provide sufficient water during dry seasons to operate the present and proposed system of locks and dams in these rivers, and to what extent the Federal Government, on the basis of their benefit to navigation, is justified in cooperating with local communities which may be interested in the construction of such reservoirs primarily for the purpose of flood prevention, and the feasibility of operating such reservoirs for the double purpose of flood prevention and improving navigation; and that this investigation be conducted by a board of three engineer officers, to be designated by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army; and that the results of this investigation be reported to Congress, with such additions as may be made thereto by the said Chief of Engineers, not later than December 7, 1912; and that for this purpose the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be needed, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 139: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 139, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: ", and inland waterway between Charleston and McClellanville by way of Alligator Creek and Sewee Bay"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 147: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 147, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert: "Escambia and Conecuh Rivers, Ala. and Fla., from River Falls to the mouth in the Gulf of Mexico"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 153: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 153, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "Black River, Ark., near Buttermilk Bank, with a view of protecting the bank in the interests of navigation"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 157: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 157, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the proposed amendment strike out the word "Little"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 177: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 177, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "Padilla Bay, Skagit County, Washington, with a view of ascertaining the desirability of modifying or relocating the navigable channels in said bay"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 180: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 180, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "Channel connecting Admiralty Inlet with Crockett Lake, Washington"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 182: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 182, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Before the first word of the proposed amendment insert "Sec. 13." and transfer the paragraph as thus amended to its proper place at the end of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

KNUTE NELSON,
JONATHAN BOURNE,
F. M. SIMMONS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

M. SPARKMAN,
JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
GEORGE P. LAWRENCE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire merely to make a brief statement. The river and harbor bill when it came here from the other House carried a cash appropriation of $24,062,520.50, and provided for continuing contracts to the amount of $2,200,000, or an aggregate in cash and continuing contracts of $26,262,520.50. The Senate added to the bill by amendment $8,054,010 and struck out $233,000 of the amount proposed by the House. So the net increase made by the Senate in the bill was $7,821,010. The total of the bill as it went into conference was $34,083,530.50. The net reductions effected by the conferees amount to $824,160. Therefore the bill in its present form, as agreed to by the conferees, carries $33,259,370.50, instead of $34,083,530.50, which it carried as it came to the conferees; in other words, the net reduction effected by the conferees was $824,160.

I will say that in all the important amendments of the Senate no reductions were made; it was only in a few isolated cases that reductions were made. Wherever reductions were made in the appropriations for harbors Senators interested were consulted, and no changes were made without their consent. I therefore move the adoption of the report.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I merely desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce if he has the figures showing the Senate increases after deducting the emergency appropriations for the Mississippi River?

Mr. NELSON. I will say that the bill as it came over from the other House carried three and a half million dollars for the improvement of the Mississippi River; the Senate added to that two and a half million dollars, so that the bill carries $6,000,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi River. If it had not been for that large appropriation for the Mississippi River arising out of the peculiar flood conditions existing this year in the Mississippi Valley, the bill would have been much more moderate in amount. Ordinarily in later years river and harbor bills have carried from three to four million dollars for the Mississippi River. This year the bill carries in round numbers $6,000,000 for the improvement of that river. An appropriation of a million and a half dollars was made some three months or more ago in a joint resolution, and that sum will be deducted from the $6,000,000 appropriated in the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to amendment numbered 106 to the river and harbor bill, an amendment which passed the Senate, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War shall cause the Chief of Engineers of the Army and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors to report to Congress, in which shall be included a preliminary report not later than December 1, 1912, upon the saving, as well as other advantages, which can be accomplished by the adoption of the continuing contract system, the rapidity with which projects should be completed, upon methods of standardization by which the waterways of the country may be improved uniformly in proportion to their capacities and to the existing or probable demands of general commerce, and also report upon one or more systematized schemes of such improvement, involving all waterways heretofore examined, together with any natural or artificial channels essential for the utilization thereof, whether heretofore examined or not; also upon all projects heretofore adopted, the further improvement of which is not desirable or the expenditure upon which is out of proportion to the benefit derived therefrom. Such report may include other related information pertaining to the uses or control of the waters of the country, and the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for such examination and report.

I ask the Senator from Minnesota what disposition was made of that Senate amendment?

Mr. NELSON. The disposition made of it was that the House conferees refused to agree to it. The bill was in conference for over two months. The first meeting of the conferees was held on the 18th day of May, and we only finished the consideration of the bill yesterday. Amendment No. 106 was the last amendment which troubled the committee of conference. I can say to the Senator from Nevada that the Senate conferees did their utmost to retain the amendment in the bill. We struggled along with it as best we could, but finally found that the House conferees would not yield on that point. Although we proposed to reduce the appropriation from $100,000 to $50,000, they refused to yield; and we felt, after all the struggle, that we could not afford to delay the bill any longer. As a matter of fact, in the interest of public business and in the interest of the improvements to rivers and harbors which are now going on, this bill ought to have been passed before the 1st of July; and I think the effect of its delay will probably cause the Government, in one way or another, more damage in amount than was saved by the eight hundred and odd thousand dollars which the bill was reduced in conference.

I sympathize with the Senator from Nevada in his amendment, and I assure him that the Senate conferees did all that they could well do to retain the amendment in the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am satisfied that the Senate conferees made every effort to retain this amendment, which received the approval of the entire Committee on Commerce of the Senate. I ask the Senator from Minnesota whether the objection was to the amount of the appropriation or to the object sought to be attained by the amendment?

Mr. NELSON. The objection was not at all to the amount, for when we offered to reduce the amount from $100,000 to $50,000 it did not seem to make any difference. The objection was to the substance of the amendment.

There were three objections. First, it was contended that a part of the provisions of the amendment were already in the existing law, and, second, that a part of it was already contained in certain provisions in other portions of the bill. The most serious objection to the amendment, however, was to that portion of it which required a reexamination and reinvestigation of all existing projects. That was the one thing, perhaps, more than anything else, to which objection was raised.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, while I am entirely satisfied with the efforts of the Senate conferees to secure the acceptance of the Senate amendment, I greatly regret that the opportunity has been lost of putting upon the statute books the most effective amendment that has probably been introduced in years in a river and harbor bill; an amendment that is intended to promote economy and efficiency; that is intended to give the Engineer Corps of the Army the power to plan a system of connected and related waterways of the country, just as full and comprehensive in its character as are the plans of our railways; an amendment which was intended to rescue the river improvements of the country from the spoils system which has so long prevailed—a system which we have entirely done away with, so far as public offices and public patronage are concerned, but which still remains to afflict us in matters relating to public works, enterprises relating to public buildings, and the rivers and harbors of our country.

This is a question which has been before the American people for many years. It has been urged persistently by river and harbor congresses, by waterway associations, in political conventions, and has found form in our national platforms.

I am amazed that the House of Representatives has failed to respond, not only to the public opinion upon this question, but to the express declarations of the platforms of both political parties. The Republican platform of four years ago pledged that party to carry out the declarations of Mr. Roosevelt regarding the waterways, and this was a prominent feature of his recommendations. The Democratic platform was even more explicit, for it called for large and comprehensive work in the development of our waterways through the organization of a board of experts authorized by law, with the aid of an ample fund, insuring continuous work and providing for the coordination of the various scientific services of the Government and the cooperation of the Nation with the States in this work.

The only opposition to this policy that has manifested itself anywhere is manifested in Congress itself. We have had hard work making progress with it in the Senate; but we have made a steady advance, as was demonstrated by the adoption by the Senate of this amendment. So far as the House of Representatives is concerned, however, it remains still attached to the system of spoliation—the system of pothole appropriations, controlled by the Representatives of various districts, through which they secure nomination and office; a system which is cynically regardless of the ultimate purposes to be obtained, the development of a system of waterways fitted for transportation, and not a system of waterways designed to secure the expenditure of public moneys in the interest of men seeking office.

Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota says that the question of the amount was not the objection, for when the Senate conferees proposed to reduce the amount from $100,000 to $50,000 it seemed to make no difference; so that we have the purpose of this amendment opposed in this conference.

What are the facts with reference to the Engineer Corps? Many of us have been disposed to criticise the Engineer Corps for lack of initiative. We have complained that it never yet has presented a full and comprehensive plan to Congress for a system of waterways. I shared in that complaint and in that criticism, until finally my attention was called by a prominent officer of the Engineer Corps to the fact that in almost every river and harbor bill the Engineer Corps of the Army has been expressly forbidden by the terms of the river and harbor bill itself to report upon anything except the matter submitted to them by the bill, so that the Engineer Corps of the Army was itself in chains, imposed by Congress in aid of the spoils system that has so long prevailed. Finally a year ago the Chief of Engineers of the Army concluded to act outside of the mere matters submitted to him in previous bills by Congress, and he ventured the suggestion in the mildest of terms—a suggestion which I shall incorporate in the RECORD—that if Congress desired a plan for a related system of waterways, the Corps of Engineers was ready to furnish it; and he indulged in an argument in its favor. It was upon that suggestion that I framed this amendment. It received the careful consideration of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE], was improved in its general form and character, passed the committee, and was inserted in the bill.

Now, we find that the suggestion of the Engineer Corps of the Army is rejected and that the Engineer Corps of the Army is still in chains. In what contrast has our action been with reference to the great question of irrigation and the great question of the development of the Panama Canal. Upon the question of irrigation we passed a short act of 8 or 10 sections, absolutely giving the Secretary of the Interior the power, upon the approval of any project, to perfect the plans and go on with the work, the only limitation being that no expenditures and no contracts should be made unless the moneys for their payment were in the irrigation fund. You know how that work has progressed since 1902, steadily and continuously and outside of the spoils system, with substantial and satisfactory results achieved within a space of 9 or 10 years.

Then, when we came to the Panama Canal we planned big there; we authorized large expenditures and gave the Engineer Corps of the Army practically a free hand. We are now approaching the completion of that great enterprise. Yet we have expended upon the rivers of this country a sum much larger than has been expended upon both irrigation works and the Panama Canal without any substantial results in the betterment of our waterways as instrumentalities of transportation. They have been largely thus far the means through which money has been drawn from the Treasury to be expended in the various districts of public men. That perhaps is too severe a statement, for I realize that under the able leadership and direction of the Senator from Ohio, as chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, improvements have been made in the methods of administration; improvements have been made by the creation of Army boards authorized to pass in judgment upon the various projects that were presented, and, finally, a kind of public opinion has been created in Congress to prevent the passage of any bill relating to a project which has not received the approval of the Engineer Corps and of the various boards; but the struggle to accomplish what has been accomplished was a hard one, and now, when we are about to get what public opinion demands and what our party platforms demand, we are defeated by the action of the Representatives of the people.

The responsibility for this does not rest upon the country at large or upon public opinion; it does not rest upon the Executive of the Nation, either Mr. Roosevelt or Mr. Taft, both of whom have made recommendations in this direction; it does not rest upon the Secretary of War, whose judgment coincides with action of this kind; it does not rest upon the Engineer Corps of the Army; it rests upon Congress. This is one of the things so constantly occurring that are impairing the confidence of the people in their own Representatives and inducing them to consider seriously the direct assumption, through the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, of the powers of government.

Mr. President, I wish to enter my protest against the action of this conference committee, and at the same time to express my appreciation to the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Minnesota, and his Senate associates for the determined stand which they made for this amendment.

I now ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the statement to which I have referred of the Chief of Engineers of the Army, taken from his annual report of 1911.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection permission is granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Under existing law reexaminations of existing projects are made by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors in compliance with resolutions by either the Committee on Commerce of the Senate or the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives; but these reexaminations are subject to the limitation that no enlargement of the scope of the project can be considered, so that desirable extensions of projects can not be recommended. It is believed that a similar provision of law authorizing the Chief of Engineers to cause a reexamination of projects, at least those not heretofore passed upon by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, would be in the public interest. Projects reported under the provisions of section 7 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899, as unworthy of further improvement by the United States or considered by the Chief of Engineers as in need of revision could in this way be fully investigated, local interests could be heard, and formal report thereon made for the consideration of Congress. It would seem advisable in connection with any such reexamination to grant authority to consider and report upon any modifications in the nature of enlargements in scope of projects believed to be desirable, when such modifications are recommended by district officers or otherwise brought to the attention of the department.

If desired by Congress, for its consideration in providing for new works, reports could be submitted by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors and the Chief of Engineers upon the relative importance of the various improvements recommended as worthy of being undertaken by the United States, the order in which the works should be taken up, and the rapidity with which they should be completed, upon methods of standardization by which the waterways of the country could be improved uniformly in proportion to their capacities and to the existing or probable demands of general commerce, or even report upon a systematic scheme of such improvement embracing all waterways, whether heretofore examined and reported upon or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. I ask that the statement which I send to the desk may be printed in the RECORD immediately following the adoption of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

The statement referred to is as follows:

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the Senator from Connecticut yielded the floor?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not intend to yield the floor, but I will say to the Senator from Michigan, if he desires to speak now and it suits his convenience to do so, I will be glad to yield to him.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not care to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It will be no interruption. If it is more convenient for the Senator to make his remarks now, I am perfectly willing to yield the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not care particularly to speak at this time. I will inquire about how much time the Senator expects to occupy?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no set remarks; I have a few scattered remarks to make, but I can make them just as well later if it will accommodate the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would just as lief the Senator would proceed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well. Mr. President, it is difficult to discuss in one speech a bill of this kind in its entirety. It contains so many different subjects of great importance that it seems to me it should not be discussed in all its different features at one time. I think it tends to distract the attention of those who want to understand each particular proposition clearly before they make up their minds to vote for it; and, as soon as such general speeches as Senators care to make upon the bill have been concluded, I think the better and more orderly way would be to ask that the bill be read for amendment, and, perhaps, that the committee amendments should be first considered. The bill has been read in its entirety, the formal reading of the bill having been completed, and it is printed in the RECORD, and I think very shortly the time will arrive when I shall ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration for amendment.

One of the first questions that then will come up upon which I anticipate a difference of opinion will be whether the canal when completed shall be administered by a single officer, in the nature of a governor of the canal or of the Canal Zone, or whether that management and operation and responsibility shall be delegated to a commission. There were differences of opinion in the committee about that, the majority of the Senate committee favoring a commission of three, while I think the House committee was nearly unanimous for a single administrator.

Then comes, I think, in section 5 of the bill, the question of tolls. Mr. President, of course to those who want to bestow the right of free passage through the canal upon American ships, either those engaged exclusively in the coastwise trade or also those engaged in the foreign trade, the question involved in the treaties is essential. While I have views about the treaties, those views do not enter into the determination of the question with me, because I do not want to confer free passage upon American ships of any kind. I have never had that in mind, and I think the Canal Commission has never had it in mind, as will appear in the testimony of Col. Goethals given before various committees, both on the Isthmus and here in Washington. They have always based their estimates of the receipts of the canal upon the theory that we were to charge every vessel that went through there what was stated under the treaty to be a just and reasonable price for the work done. So that while I have views about the treaties, they are merely academic questions with me, so far as my vote is concerned.

I take the view of this canal that it is a great undertaking of an international character, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty providing that it should be the joint project of Great Britain and the United States and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty eliminating Great Britain as a joint partner in the enterprise and giving us exclusive jurisdiction of the control and operation of the canal. I regard it—it being, of course, admittedly the greatest work of human hands in any age of the world's history—as having, so to speak, moved the Straits of Magellan approximately 4,000 miles to the northward

It seems to me that the saving to the coastwise, the port-to-port, trade of this country, conducted by American vessels, to which by this expenditure of $400,000,000, together with its maintenance and armament and defense forever, the canal has been dedicated, a saving of 8,000 miles of travel and all the expense of fuel and maintenance and pay of crew involved in that shortening of time, is a sufficient favor to have been conferred by the General Government upon this particular interest, which already has the additional favor of an absolute monopoly in the coastwise trade.

I for one, while I have the utmost charity of feeling toward any other view, toward any person who differs with me about it, do not consider that because I happen to think it is fairer that each vessel, whether owned by an American or a foreigner, which avails itself of this great advantage which it had never had before, and, availing itself of it, pays to the Government of the United States a sum such as some commission or the President or the proper person shall fix to reimburse, to a certain extent at least, the Government or help to pay the interest upon this tremendous sum of money of the people raised by taxes upon the property of all the people—I have never thought that I entertained any unpatriotic view because I favored the collection of that small, reasonable sum from these ships, which already have this exclusive market and this great favor conferred upon them. Because the Government of Great Britain takes the same view that I have always held and which the commission has held and which I think prevailed until, I will not say this propaganda but this demand arose from those who own ships and those boards of trade and chambers of commerce throughout the country which are naturally influenced in favor of free passage—because I have taken that view and Great Britain takes that view later on in the construction of the treaty I do not think there is anything unpatriotic about trying to make the ships for which this is to a large extent a special favor, for their benefit, pay their own way instead of asking the American people—everybody—to whom it may be no special benefit, to be taxed for them, whereas in my opinion it is a special benefit to the class I have mentioned.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to submit to the Senator whether or not the argument he is now making for charging tolls on vessels engaged in the coastwise trade would not be equally applicable to vessels plying the Mississippi River, passing through the locks of that river, or to the traffic up and down the Columbia River or the Sacramento River or through the Great Lakes, where the Government maintains systems of canals and locks? Now, the moneys which have been appropriated from time to time by the Congress of the United States for the construction of these locks and dams and for the improvement of these rivers, and the improvement of harbors as well, is in the nature of a general tax taken from the people of the whole country, and the traffic that goes through the canal between ports on the Atlantic and ports on the Pacific is just as much interstate traffic as the traffic which goes up and down the Mississippi River or any other of these streams through the canals and locks constructed by the Government.

I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut, if the reasoning which he is now urging upon the Senate is to apply, inasmuch as the people are taxed for the construction of the Panama Canal, would it not reverse what has been the policy of this Government for a hundred years to compel a charge to be levied upon vessels passing through the rivers and harbors of the country?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, that is the claim of those who believe in free passage for our American coastwise vessels. In my judgment it is not well founded, but I will say to the Senators interested in this matter that I think there is almost nothing new to be said on this subject. If Senators care to inform themselves about the claims of both sides, and if they will take the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this session and look at the House debates, commencing at page 7219, I think they will find there is almost nothing new left to be said on the subject.

I certainly do not propose to take the time of the Senate to rehearse all the views which are already upon record, contained in the reports of the House committee, the majority and the minority reports; contained in the testimony before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and in the testimony before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the Senate on the House bill which we are now considering, and in the volume of testimony taken by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals at Ancon, in the Canal Zone, on October 28, 1911, known as Senate Document No. 191.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Connecticut has made a statement of the advantage that would accrue to American ships by reason of the shortening of the distance resulting from the construction of the canal. That advantage would accrue also to foreign ships to the same extent?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. To whatever extent they use the canal.

Mr. WORKS. Then no advantage is given American ships over foreign ships in that respect?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think so. I think it is given to all the ships that find it an advantage to go that way rather than through the Suez Canal.

As I said before, it has been my opinion until this session—and it is still my opinion, and was before this session, and I think the opinion of most people whom I have heard talk about it—that all vessels ought to be charged. The object of this legislation was to open the canal, start it running, charge all vessels alike, so much per ton, and after a few years, basing action upon the experience of what will then have been the past, and what is now the prognostication for the future, have some firm facts under our feet upon which to stand and base our future course.

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield, and to which Senator?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. In view of the question put to the Senator from Connecticut by the Senator from Oregon, I should like to ask him a further question. Suppose the Government of the United States were to yield, as I think it ought to yield, to a very urgent demand for the construction of a railroad in Alaska, from one of the ports to the interior coal fields. It would be built from taxes collected from the people of the United States.

Does the Senator from Oregon think that if we were to do that we ought to transport the freight over it without charge; and if he does not, what is the difference between charging for freight over a governmental railway and charging for freight over a governmental canal?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator from Iowa ask me that question?

Mr. CUMMINS. I really propounded it to the Senator from Oregon through the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I pass it along.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I simply say there is this great difference, Mr. President, between the two situations as put by the Senator from Iowa.

The waterways of this country, or many of them, are maintained for the purpose of regulating the rates by rail. There are waterways improved in this country at the expenditure of vast sums by the Government which are practically not used, but ready to be used whenever it becomes necessary to utilize them for the purpose of regulating freight rates.

Now, so it is with the Panama Canal. My opinion is if vessels engaged in the coastwise trade are permitted to go through the canal free of tolls the immediate effect will be the reduction of freight by the transcontinental railways and the regulation of freight rates by the transcontinental companies, while the construction of a railroad in Alaska would have no such effect. That would be the construction of a great public improvement principally for the development of a particular section of the country, as I understand, while on the Isthmus the construction of the Panama Canal is for the purpose largely of regulating transcontinental rates on freight.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The hearings before the committee are filled with the views and claims of all parties to this controversy, and not only both sides of this controversy, but all that could be learned from everybody who desired to appear on all the other controverted features of the bill.

I am glad to say this sort of debate we are having now in my opinion simply illustrates the almost hopelessness of trying to get anywhere on a single proposition when we are confronted with a bill involving a dozen different propositions. Of course if Senators have read this record, as the committee has heard the testimony, they have made up their minds about it. What I am saying I am not saying with any idea of trying to make any Senator come to my opinion about any of these things, but I thought it was my duty to state very briefly and informally the convictions I have come to, without attempting to convert anybody. But the minute I try to make a statement of my position in regard to tolls—and then I was coming to other things—I am asked a series of questions which would take me over the whole field.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have read the reports to which the Senator a while ago called attention, and I have been particularly edified by his industrious efforts to reach out and ascertain the truth of this whole discussion; and I commend the efforts of the Senator both then and now.

But from the Senator's argument now, Mr. President, it seems to me he places this largely upon the same basis that Col. Goethals does. If I read his testimony correctly he thinks the Panama Canal ought to be a paying proposition, and not only ought it to pay for the actual expense of maintenance, but in the end it ought to realize enough to reimburse the Government for the amount actually expended in its construction.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that that is the understanding of the people of this country, any more than that some system of tolls ought to be charged on other highways for the purpose of reimbursing the Government for the amount of money expended in that construction.

I ask the Senator now if it is his idea that tolls ought to be placed at such a figure, both on American shipping, whether coastwise or not, and on other commerce, as would be sufficient to reimburse the Government for the amount of moneys expended in construction, as well as the moneys paid out for maintenance.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No, Mr. President; it is not. I will reply to the Senator's several questions if I can recollect them; but before I do that I want to ask unanimous consent to put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point the suggestions and recommendations made by Col. Goethals to the committee on the Isthmus, which appear in the hearings, beginning on page 2 and going down to the bottom of page 5, as marked.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I would suggest that while the Senator need not take time to read the matter in detail, he might state the substance of it, so that we may have the benefit of it in the course of the discussion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There is so much of this testimony that, of course, I hate to cumber the RECORD with it, or to bore other Senators by rehearsing it; but the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has asked that the Secretary read this recommendation of Col. Goethals. Probably that will take no longer time than it would take me to pick out what I consider the essential parts of it. Therefore I will send it to the desk, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SUGGESTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS.

The estimated date for the completion of the canal was based on the report of the International Board of Engineers, submitted in 1906, and was fixed at January 1, 1915. In the meantime the work advanced more rapidly than had been anticipated, and it became apparent that it would be possible to pass vessels through the canal at least a year earlier than this date. Becoming aware of this contingency and realizing the necessity for commerce to adjust itself to the new conditions, the shipping interests of the world raised the question of canal tolls in July, 1910, and urged an early settlement. Attention was called to the fact that at least 18 months' notice of the rates should be given in order that steps might be taken in time to change routings that would follow if the canal were used. If rates are such as to warrant the adoption of the new route, commerce will adjust itself to its utilization as soon as possible; if not, the old channels will continue to be followed. Inquiry not only confirmed this statement, but developed the fact that the organization of new companies for use of the canal was contemplated, provided the established rates should be sufficiently attractive. It was developed also that two years' advance notice was desired in order to permit the building of the necessary ships.

It is of course desirable to put the canal in use as early as possible, not only to secure a financial return, but also to have everything in good running order, so as to insure the passage of the fleets of the world for which Congress has made provision, without confusion or delay.

To determine, then, the approximate date when the canal would be ready for use and to report what steps, if any, should be taken to expedite the work, a board was convened, composed of those charged with the work in progress and contemplated. Based upon the report of this board, announcement was made that all the concrete in the locks at Gatun would be laid by June 1, 1912, and in the locks on the Pacific side by October 1, 1912; that, assuming the gates were completed by June 1, 1913, as stipulated by the contract, the locks would be ready for use on this date if the operating machinery were installed; that the work on the spillway at Gatun would be completed to the elevation of 50 feet by April 1, 1912, and the entire dam would be finished by the close of the dry season of 1912–13; that the excavation through Culebra Cut would be completed by July 1, 1913, if no more material due to slides had to be removed than was estimated at that time; and that the exterior channels would be sufficiently advanced to pass the shipping that would use the canal.

It was desirable, therefore, that legislation should be provided without delay for the establishment of tolls, and should be sufficiently flexible to permit of ready change should conditions arise to warrant it. After the enactment of the necessary legislation, and before fixing the rate, data should be prepared showing the amount of traffic that might be expected, upon which to base the rate, and rules for measuring ships should be formulated so as to determine the charges to be made for various vessels.

A year has elapsed since the report upon which the statements heretofore made were based, and though an increase due to slides was made in the estimated amount of material to be removed from the Culebra Cut, this increase gives no grounds for changing the date; moreover, after the completion of the locks dredges can be passed into the cut, and the remaining material can be removed more economically and to better advantage. Though the division engineer can not complete all the concrete work on the Gatun Locks by the time first estimated, and now fixes the date as January 1, 1913, this will not interfere with the erection of the gates (the concrete needed for this purpose being practically in place) nor cause any delay to the work as a whole. Progress made in the construction of the dam confirms the promise of its completion. The division engineer adheres to the date heretofore announced for completing the locks on the Pacific side. The erection of the gates has not progressed as contemplated by the contract, but the shop work is well advanced, and by increasing the erecting force there should be no delay on this account.

The assistant chief engineer has taken all steps necessary to insure the delivery and erection of the operating machinery and lighthouses and anticipates completing them on time. The contract recently made for the emergency dams calls for completion of the last one by June 15, 1913.

The need for legislation looking toward the fixing of tolls is therefore urgent. Time can be saved in making public announcement of the rates to be charged by compiling, in advance of legislative action, the data of the amount of traffic that will probably use the canal and the formulation of rules by which the tonnage of ships is to be determined. Steps to this end have been taken.

Another matter needing attention is the organization of the operation of the canal and for the government of the Canal Zone. These two are intimately connected. Existing law provides for the construction of the canal; also for the exercise of the military, civil, and judicial powers necessary for the government of the Canal Zone during a period which has already elapsed.

As the work nears completion it is intended to concentrate the construction until what remains will be in immediate charge of the directing office, thereby reducing the costs and, as far as possible, the overhead charges. It is believed that a more satisfactory operating force can be secured by the selection of suitable men from the present organization. There has been considerable criticism because of the high wage scale that exists, but this is due to the fact that it was difficult to obtain men when the work started on account of the bad reputation of the country and also because of the temporary character of the work. Complaints are made constantly because the salaries are disproportionate to responsibilities and because of the lack of uniformity in the percentage of excess over the wage scale for similar labor in the States. After the inauguration of the scale it was not considered advisable to make any reduction, and rearrangements were made from time to time as necessities required, but inequalities still exist. Conditions are different now; the Chief Sanitary Officer declares the death rate of the zone to be "much lower than that for most parts of the United States," and the general health of about 8,000 white Americans in the zone to be "fully as good as it was in the United States"; also, continuance in employment can be assured. It is believed that a lower wage scale can be put into effect for operating the canal and that the necessary force can be secured from the men who will remain in the service during the next year or two. This is an important consideration, since it is essential that the cost of operation shall be reduced to a minimum consistent with efficiency. With the operating organization provided for, steps can be taken to adopt a salary and wage scale, after which there can be created from the construction force one for operation without delay or confusion.

The total outlay for maintaining the canal will be for wages of the force engaged in its operation, the expense of engineering work connected therewith, and the cost of sanitation and civil administration. It is difficult to foresee the uses to which the land in the zone may be put. There are, all told, within the limits of the zone 436 square miles, of which about 73 square miles are in private ownership and 363 square miles owned by the Government (i. e., either by the commission or the Panama Railroad Co.); of the latter, 96 square miles are occupied by the canal. A large part of the Government land will be required for military and naval purposes, and it is not unlikely that additional lands will be required by other departments of the Government. The position of the Republic of Panama and its two cities with respect to the zone makes it necessary in the interest of harmony that the Spanish laws now in force shall obtain. The rules and regulations for the government of the zone made effective subsequent to the Fifty-eighth Congress should be approved and changes should be authorized to meet new conditions as they arise.

Under existing law lands may be leased for a period not exceeding 25 years, with the understanding that the cost of all improvements shall be reimbursed to the lessee in case the lands are needed for other purposes. It is generally the rule that land taken for governmental purposes is never sufficient and must always be extended, and from experience gained in the prices agreed upon for lands taken for canal purposes the improvements are always expensive. For the most part the configuration of the ground is not suitable for exteusive farming; material obstacles tend to hinder agricultural development; a perpetual title can not be assured, and the Spanish system of taxation must be continued to avoid friction on account of unfair competition with the Panamans. The inducements offered are not likely to attract Americans. Other occupants are not desirable. The town sites already established are populated by laborers, a class which should be repatriated after work can no longer be given them, and the growth of such towns should be discouraged. The greater the amount of land leased and the number of town sites established and occupied, the greater will be the cost of sanitation and civil government. For several years to come at least it is believed that the best policy will be to keep all Government lands for Government purposes. Whatever military force is located on the Isthmus will be charged with its own sanitation. The reservation of all lands for governmental use would result, therefore, in minimum costs for these two items.

The Canal Zone occupies a unique position among the outlying possessions of the United States, and on this account requires special treatment. The construction of the canal is the original purpose for which it was obtained, and to this purpose everything within the zone is made subordinate. In the same way, after its completion, everything must be subordinated to the operation of the canal. Assuming that the canal is being built for the benefit of the commerce of the world, it nevertheless is a military asset to the United States, and conditions may arise in which the military necessities of the Nation will become paramount. It is essential, therefore, that an entity should be established or created and so organized that any contingency can be promptly met as soon as it rises. In other words, while during certain periods the operation of the canal is for commercial purposes, entirely separate and distinct from the military, there are times when the military necessities must predominate.

Every known precaution has been taken to insure the safety of the locks. Accidents to locks have in nearly every case resulted from misunderstood signals in the engine room. To avoid any possibility of accident which might render the canal useless the authorities should assume charge of all vessels during their transit of the locks; under such conditions any damage that may result to the vessels should be assumed by the Government, and legislation looking to this end is necessary.

The revenues of the canal should go to pay not only the operating expenses, but to repay the capital invested. Every legitimate means for increasing the revenue should therefore be adopted. The Government should have coal and fuel oil on hand for its own vessels, and these commodities should be sold to shipping using the canal. These should be supplied at an established rate and purchased after advertisement. The existing commissary, manufacturing plant, and laundry should be continued for the benefit of Government forces and to furnish supplies and service to shipping. A wireless telegraph station should be established for commercial as well as military purposes. The canal authorities should be authorized to sell tools and appliances needed by ships and to make repairs as may be necessary while ships are in the vicinity of the canal. A dry dock should be built with dimensions conforming to the locks. Both the dry dock and machine shops would be available for use by the Navy. If this policy is to be adopted, early legislation is needed in order that the construction necessary to make it effective may be undertaken without delay.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now, Mr. President, recurring to the inquiry of the Senator from Oregon as to why the Panama Canal should not be treated in the same way and subject to the same general governmental policy that our internal waterways and coastways and harbors are treated by the Government, it seems to me that there is no analogy whatever between those two matters. Some people say that the Panama Canal should be considered as simply a continuation of our coast; that it is a strip of water connecting our Atlantic coast with our Pacific coast. Of course that is not so. It is a strip of water connecting the Atlantic Ocean with the Pacific Ocean, just as the Straits of Magellan now connect the two oceans, removed 4,000 miles nearer American soil, but still 2,000 miles removed from American soil. We have built no canal in our own country or in our own sovereignty. We have a treaty which permits us to build and operate the canal in a foreign country, and while we have the sole right to the possession, and exclusive possession and operation of it, the Government of Panama retains the sovereignty of it.

The language of the treaty is peculiar. We can do everything in relation to canal purposes that we could if we had the sovereignty, but Panama retains the sovereignty. We have built a canal on foreign shores, and to say that simply because it is a great canal and is of advantage to our ships that want to go from our Pacific coast to our Atlantic coast, and vice versa, therefore it should be treated as one of our internal waterways, it seems to me is not in point at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is not the Senator mistaken in saying that Panama retains the strip of land through which the canal runs?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think I am.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand that Panama gave up the sovereignty of the strip in which the canal passes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I think the Senator is mistaken, if he understood it that way. The treaty itself will speak about that, however. It is right here, and I will look it up as soon as I take my seat.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. For a few miles on either side of the canal Panama cedes the sovereignty to the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That was exactly the issue between Colombia and the United States. We demanded of Colombia that she should give up the sovereignty of this strip and upon that point her statesmen declared that they lacked the power to yield the sovereignty, and therefore could not enter into the treaty with the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is just what I claim, that Panama took the same position and retained the sovereignty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On the other hand, Panama being a little Republic created for the purpose very promptly ceded the sovereignty to the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will put in the provision of the treaty as soon as I take my seat and let the treaty speak for itself. As for that matter, I am perfectly certain that Panama retained its sovereignty and we have a right to do everything that we need to do there in the construction of a canal. However that may be, it is not material.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut, in this connection, if the exact language of the treaty is not that while we have all the rights of sovereignty, so far as this particular strip of land is concerned, we do not have the sovereignty in the respect named in the treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would not say that that was the exact language of the treaty, but that is the exact substance of it, as I recall it. I thought myself, when I looked at it, that it was rather a peculiar provision, but we got the substance of what we wanted, and we were willing to defer to the patriotic sentiment that that Government would naturally have about yielding to a foreign power the sovereignty within its own territorial limits.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I call the attention of the Senator to the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama, article 2, which provides:

ART. II. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal of the width of 10 miles, extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal to be constructed; the said zone beginning in the Caribbean Sea 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark and extending to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to a distance of 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark, with the proviso that the cities of Panama and Colon and the harbors adjacent to said cities, which are included within the boundaries of the zone above described, shall not be included within this grant.

As I understand it, that is the only exception.

The Republic of Panama further grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of any other lands and waters outside of the zone above described which may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal or of any auxiliary canals or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said enterprise.

I think you will find that Col. Goethals, either in the statement that was just read or in the testimony before one or other of the committees, spoke about the disposition of the soil.

Mr. PAGE. May I interrupt the Senator there?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will say to the Senator that I assume he is reading from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am reading from the convention between the United States and the Republic of Panama for the construction of a ship canal to connect the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, signed at Washington November 18, 1903, and I read from article 3, as published on page 269 of the Senate committee hearing on the Canal Zone, as follows:

ART. III. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in Article II of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said Article II which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located, to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It seems to me that those two provisions not only cede this strip to the Government of the United States, but that Panama absolutely surrenders to the Government of the United States jurisdiction and sovereignty over the strip.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It does not seem so to me at all. It seems to me as though Panama granted to the United States the rights, so far as the construction of the canal are concerned, which the United States would have if it were sovereign, but it does not say it is sovereign.

But, as I said, I do not want to be drawn into these side passages, because that is of no consequence whatever, in my opinion; it has no relevancy to the question which the Senator from Oregon propounded to me. I am trying to differentiate——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it is important here, because the Senator has insisted that there was no parallel between waterways in our own country and the construction of the Panama Canal, and I have insisted that the waterways in our country are within our own boundary and that the construction of the Panama Canal is through land which practically belongs to the United States and over which Panama has ceded jurisdiction.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As I view it, Mr. President, we simply have a right to build a canal and maintain it there under the treaty, just as a railroad when it has condemned land. I suppose if we abandon that canal and fail to maintain a canal there the United States would never claim that the 10-mile strip is a part of this territory or its possessions.

To be sure they own land there in fee, but they acquired it by treaty. I say, however that may be, the fact remains that this canal is built through a strip of land 2,000 miles removed from continental United States on the Isthmus of Panama below Central America, between Central and South America, and it seems to me to be a wild stretch of the imagination to say that when it was to a large extent constructed for military and naval purposes, in addition to commercial purposes, it should be treated on the basis of the declared policy of the Government as to the administration of its internal waterways and coast harbors.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. Speaking of the possible abandonment on the Isthmus of the strip which we now own and control, is it not a fact that we have acquired practically all the real estate on, or we make provision in this bill to acquire all the real estate in, this strip from private holders and make it a part of our own possessions—Government land?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am listening to the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. Have we not done that?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not know the Senator had concluded. Certainly, Mr. President, we acquired it. It is a complicated matter. It has all been gone into before the committee. When we took over the French company and made the treaty with the Government of Panama, we acquired various properties and rights which the old company had, and we have some rights under other treaties now.

I wish to call attention of the Senator from Kansas to the fact that the mere possession or ownership of the fee of land by this Government or by one of its citizens in a foreign country does not give this Government or its citizens any sovereignty.

It holds it subject to the country where it is located. The fact that our Government may own a thousand acres of land within the Republic of Panama and adjoining the central line of the canal does not of itself give us any governmental rights there. The only rights we have there are those which we acquire by the treaty.

Mr. BRISTOW. But we do not own this land in a foreign country subject to the sovereignty of that foreign country. It is subject to our own sovereignty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator knows very well—and I say with all due respect to him, one of his grievances is that while our citizens in Colon own pretty much all the city, it is all subject to the taxing laws of the Government of Panama, and our people owning the land there, being in the minority, are subjected to the local tax laws and pay for all the public improvements there in the city of Colon. So agitated was the Senator, if I may say so without violating the confidence that he imparted to me, he would like to see the treaty amended so that we could exchange with the Panaman Government certain lands for which we have no particular use and they could cede to us these lands which would be of use to us by allowing our people to govern themselves there.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; I am free to say that one of my objections to the treaty was that we permitted a foreign government to have a municipal dominion within our own territory. I think it was a very grave mistake.

But, again, the Senator suggested that this was a strip of land 2,000 miles from our country, and that it was acquired for certain purposes. The Hawaiian Islands are 2,000 miles from our shore and still we are expending money there improving harbors, and so forth. It seems to me that there is practically no difference in the relationship of the Panama Canal Zone and the Hawaiian Islands or Porto Rico, as far as sovereignty goes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The question of the sovereignty, as I said before, I regard as immaterial. Now, as to the views of Prof. Johnson upon this question of——

Mr. REED. Before we leave that question, if it will not disturb the Senator——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not at all.

Mr. REED. I want to call attention to the fact that there are two separate provisions contained in this treaty with reference to the rights of the United States. I think by paralleling them we will get a clearer view of what was intended with reference to the question of sovereignty. Article 2 contains the language——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What page is the Senator reading from?

Mr. REED. I am reading from page 269 of Senate Document 191, Sixty-second Congress, second session. Article 2 contains the following language:

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal of the width of 10 miles, extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal to be constructed.

Then follows a description more in detail.

The Republic of Panama further grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of any other lands and waters outside of the zone above described which may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal or of any auxiliary canals.

Then follows more description:

The Republic of Panama further grants in like manner to the United States in perpetuity all islands within the limits of the zone above described, etc.

Now, that is a grant of property; that is a property grant.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; it grants the use, occupation, and control of the property.

Mr. REED. Yes; but that use, occupation, and control is a property right, a property grant. It is such a grant as could be made and would be made by a sovereign to some person or government with relation to property, the sovereignty of which still remains in the grantor. If we stopped there the contention of the Senator from Connecticut would be fully sustained by the text of the treaty.

But now we come to article 3, a separate article, dealing with a separate question. We have already dealt with the question of property, a property question, the right to take, the right to improve, the right to condemn, the right to acquire property interests, and to utilize the property rights. We pass over that now, all of it being contained in article 2, to article 3, and we find that we are dealing with a different subject matter, and what is that subject matter?

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in Article II of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said Article II.

I go back a moment. It grants—

All the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article 2 of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said article 2 which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located, to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority.

Now, article 2 deals with property rights and article 3, it seems to me, deals with sovereignty rights; and when the Government of Panama grants to the United States all such rights and powers as it would have if it were the sovereign, that language means no more and no less than if it would say, "We hereby grant to you the full right of sovereignty." That is made plainer by the language which follows:

To the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority.

Mr. President, if the Government of Panama grants to the United States all of the powers the United States would have if sovereign, that in itself makes the United States sovereign, but when it follows that and excludes itself from any acts of sovereignty, it must be true, it seems to me, that as the sovereignty is always vested somewhere, in some government, if the Government of Panama makes a grant which excludes it from the exercise of any sovereignty, then that does not leave this strip of ground without any sovereignty; it must be somewhere; and as sovereignty is abdicated by the Government of Panama and in favor of the Government of the United States, there can be no question, in my opinion, but that we are the undisputed sovereign of that tract of land.

You can not conceive of a piece of ground occupied by human beings upon which there is a civilization without having a sovereignty, and as the Government of Panama has excluded itself from sovereignty by these words and has granted all of the rights to this Government that it would possess if it were a sovereign, this Government becomes ipso facto the sovereign.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I totally disagree with the Senator from Missouri in that matter. I will put in the RECORD later, as soon as I can find it, a letter written by President Taft, who was then Secretary of War, to one of the canal authorities in relation to this very question of the construction of the treaty, giving the view entertained by him. It is all in the hearings here. This question was discussed before the committee on the zone. If I recall the President's words, they were that Panama retains simply the titular sovereignty; that we have the actual rights of sovereignty, the right to govern it, and so forth, but they retain the titular sovereignty. That is my view of it.

Mr. REED. In other words, the Senator, I take it, would liken it to a deed to a piece of property in which the naked title was retained in trust by somebody else, but you never can find a deed of that kind which retains even the naked title that contains the language of entire repudiation of any right on the part of the trustee. You can not find such a deed that has in it language to the entire exclusion of any rights on the part of the trustee.

I am sure the Senator knows that we are simply trying to get at this as it is. I think it is a fundamental question in discussing this case. I have great respect for any opinion that the President may have given at the time of these negotiations. But these matters are always settled by the language of the instrument itself, and I do not know how you can have a repudiation of all acts and powers of sovereignty and at the same time retain sovereignty. I do not know how you can do it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As I said before, Mr. President, of course I do not expect to change the Senator's opinion, and I have no quarrel with him about it. I am willing he should retain that view of it.

Mr. REED. I am trying to change the Senator's view.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When I quoted the President's view I did not do it with any idea of having Senators think I wanted them to defer to the opinion of that distinguished lawyer, if they had a contrary opinion, but simply in passing to state that that question had been considered, and when he was Secretary of War he had taken that view and so written to the commission.

From my point of view I can not conceive that there is any signification whatever in the language of article 3, in which the Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory, unless it were not the sovereign. But be that as it may, the Senator from Missouri says this is the fundamental question in the whole matter. I do not agree with him on that, either.

Mr. REED. I said a fundamental question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well; I do not consider it so. I am trying to get away from it, because I do not consider it so. I simply say that I do not think the canal ever was thought to be upon the basis of dredging out a harbor or dredging out a river in the promotion of our interstate commerce; but I have considered the canal to be in no respect different from the Straits of Magellan, except that it was to move those straits nearer to the United States and except that in order to pass through those straits we had to use mechanical devices. That is all the difference that I think exists. I think if we had gone down to the Straits of Magellan and put in machinery there, if it had been necessary, to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, there would then be no parallel between that operation and the administration of our internal waterways. I am simply saying that is my view of it. So I, from the beginning, have been in favor and still am in favor of making that canal as free of access to every vessel in the world as it may be. I am in favor of treating it as a great arm of the sea. I am in favor of giving it its broadest international significance, of administering it in a way not only to promote the commerce of the whole world and to induce more frequent coming to both our coasts by not only our own commerce but the commerce of the whole world, but to administer it in a way, so far as possible, to secure the good will of the whole world and to avoid any international complications or animosities. I think that will be done if we shall proceed as I have indicated.

The senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has indicated that even the views of Prof. Johnson are not entitled to great weight, who has devoted years and years to the investigation of this subject and has availed himself of all the information that is on file anywhere of all the tolls and counts and the passages of vessels between particular ports, the frequency of their voyages and their destinations, and the proportion of cargo carried hither and thither, who has availed himself of everything that is in the libraries and the archives of the bodies of commerce of the world. It must be admitted that his conclusions are not infallible. The Senator from Missouri evidently does not give them great weight. I do not know how much weight to give them. At the best they are the scientific guessings of a man who has devoted his best efforts to analyzing all the evidence available as his prophecy for the future.

I say I would open this canal upon the same terms to all the vessels of the world. I would allow the President or some commission appointed by him to run it. I would give them the authority to fix the tolls.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I interrupt the Senator from Connecticut to make a brief statement?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Something that I said a few moments ago might be used as a basis for the impression that I question the correctness of Prof. Johnson's statement.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I referred to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that. I have the very highest regard for Prof. Johnson's opinions in this matter. I believe he is better qualified to express an opinion with regard to the volume of traffic that may pass through the Panama Canal than is any Senator, because he has given so much more study to the subject; but the error into which we may fall if we accept his view implicitly is this: His view does not take into account the adjustment of tolls at varying rates as against our competitors. For instance, suppose the Suez Canal should cut its rates in half, that would make a great difference in Prof.

Johnson's estimate; suppose the transcontinental railways should reduce their rates by half, that would make a very great difference in the amount of traffic passing through the canal. I call this to the attention of the Senate now, because we ought to consider carefully what Prof. Johnson said. I, for one, believe that we shall have to adjust our rates on the business in which we compete with the Suez Canal according to rates maintained by the Suez Canal. I believe we shall have to adjust our rates on business destined to our western coast in order to allow competition with our transcontinental railroads. I believe we shall have to adjust our rates on business destined to the western coast of South America according to the cost of doing business around Cape Horn. Therefore, the factors taken by Prof. Johnson in his investigation and upon which he gave his estimates, valuable as they are, must necessarily be variable factors if we attempt to meet the competition of the rest of the world in fixing rates through the Panama Canal.

I feared that something I said a few moments ago might lead the Senate to believe that I did not give proper credit to Prof. Johnson's deductions. I want to be clearly understood about that, because I think that he has as intelligent and learned a view as anyone whose statement upon the subject I have ever read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I agree to a great deal of what the Senator from Iowa has said. What I was saying was not intended to be any criticism upon him or upon the senior Senator from Missouri nor any intimation as to their good faith or as to their opinion of Prof. Johnson; I was simply endeavoring to show that, no matter how much a man may have investigated this subject or how well qualified he may be to form an opinion now, it is at best a scientific guess and the estimate of a great many variable and complicated things which may happen in the future.

I want to call the attention of Senators to the fact that Prof. Johnson's testimony upon all these questions is to be found in the Senate committee hearings, beginning a little before page 25 and running along after that point. He discusses these questions, of course simply giving his best judgment. Col. Goethals is in favor, and I am in favor, whether rightly or wrongly, of what he believes to be the wisest course. Possibly it may turn out to be the wrong course, but it is a safe course, it seems to me, to say nothing about free passage to anybody at present and authorize the President or a commission or somebody that can have the benefit of this testimony and then of their own studies to fix the tolls on all vessels that go through the Panama Canal, and run the canal a year and see what happens, ascertain whether the canal receipts are such as would indicate that the rate is low enough to attract business from our competitor, the Suez Canal, and with authority to raise and lower rates within definite limits, allowing them some discretion so as to adjust the rates along the lines of a sliding scale as the immediate needs might demonstrate was proper.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

PROPOSED VOTE ON WOOL, SUGAR, AND EXCISE BILLS.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have asked the Senator from Connecticut to yield to me only for a moment in order that I may make a request.

I realize fully the embarrassment and inconvenience of the present situation in the Senate, and I am anxious, if possible, to reach some agreement by which that situation may be relieved. I desire to ask Senators on the other side of the Chamber if it is not possible for us to enter into an agreement providing for a vote upon the wool bill, the sugar bill, and the excise bill at some early day?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am positive there is no disposition on the part of Senators on this side of the Chamber to delay a vote upon those bills; and I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday, July 25, 1912, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 22195) to reduce duties on wool and manufactures of wool, and that before adjournment on that day we shall vote upon any amendment that may then be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill, through the regular parliamentary stages, to its final disposition.

I should also like to give notice that I shall follow this request by asking unanimous consent for a vote on what are known as the sugar bill and the excise bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest to the Senator from Utah whether he had not better insert in the agreement the word "calendar," so as to read "on that calendar day"?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course I am perfectly willing to insert "calendar day" in the motion, although "that day" means the calendar day.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it would probably be better to say "calendar day."

Mr. SMOOT. I will accept the suggestion and make it read "calendar day."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The suggested unanimous-consent agreement will be stated from the desk.

The Secretary read as follows:

"It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Thursday, July 25, 1912, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 22195) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, and before adjournment on that calendar day will vote upon any amendment that may then be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] if he would have any objection to fixing an hour certain at which the vote might be had on the bill on that day?

Mr. SMOOT. There was some objection to fixing an hour to vote, and I thought it better to leave it merely the calendar day rather than to fix an hour.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think many Senators would like to know what time of the day the bill will be voted on in order that they may be certain to be present at the time; and I ask the Senator from Utah if he would have any objection to providing that the vote shall be taken on or before 6 o'clock on that day?

Mr. SMOOT. I am afraid there would be objection to that request. So far as I am personally concerned, I would not object, but I am positive there would be objection to fixing an hour.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I should like to have the proposed unanimous-consent agreement again read. I did not hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed unanimous-consent agreement will again be read at the request of the Senator from Wyoming.

The Secretary again read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I understand that if we give unanimous consent to this proposition it is upon the understanding that unanimous consent of a similar character will be given with reference to the sugar bill and the excise bill?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the understanding.

Mr. HEYBURN. And the cotton bill?

Mr. SMOOT. That has not been received by the Senate as yet.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but when it comes in.

Mr. REED. With that understanding I do not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it might be well for us——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, pardon me, but to avoid any trouble about that, would it not be well to unite all of these bills in one request?

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing now to present the other requests for unanimous consent and ask that they be read.

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely want to make a suggestion, to avoid leaving the matter to subsequent construction. While it is true the cotton bill is not yet over here, there is tacit understanding that when it comes over it will be subject to the same action.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator from Utah, which will necessarily precipitate the tariff bills into this body at a time when they can not be very thoroughly discussed, must be for the purpose of enabling the appropriation bills to be considered without further delay and to the end that we may have an early adjournment?

Mr. SMOOT. I sincerely hope and trust, Mr. President, that that will be the result.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hope that that will be the result. If these bills are not to be gotten out of the way on that theory, they ought to be thoroughly discussed.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I offer the order which I send to the desk providing that a vote be taken upon all three of the bills and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah, then, withdraws the first request for unanimous consent for the time being?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I withdraw my original request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah now offers a request for unanimous consent, which will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

"It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Thursday, July 25, 1912, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 22195) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, and before adjournment on that calendar day will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

"And, further, it is agreed by unanimous consent that on Saturday, July 27, 1912, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21213) to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties,' etc. (known as the sugar bill), and before adjournment on that calendar day will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

"And, further, it is agreed by unanimous consent that on Friday, July 26, 1912, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21214) to extend the special excise tax now levied with respect to doing business by corporations to persons, and to provide revenue for the Government by levying a special excise tax with respect to doing business by individuals and copartnerships, and before adjournment on that calendar day will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. STONE. I desire to ask a question. If unanimous consent is given to enter that order, I should like to know whether it would preclude the right of a Senator, if he so desired, during the consideration of the so-called sugar bill on Friday to offer the excise bill as an amendment? I ask that because the agreement proposes that the following day, Saturday, shall be set apart for the consideration of the excise bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, did the Senator ask for a ruling of the Chair, or did he ask what the opinion of Senators may be upon that?

Mr. STONE. Well, I will ask what the opinion of the Senator is upon it?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, my opinion is that under the unanimous-consent agreement an amendment proposing to attach the excise bill to the sugar bill on Friday would be out of order.

Mr. STONE. Well, I should like a ruling of the Chair in answer to the parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not undertake to decide a parliamentary question in advance, but the Chair will venture to express the opinion that if unanimous consent is given to consider a certain well-recognized bill, a motion to substitute a bill on an entirely different subject would not be in order.

Mr. STONE. I did not say to substitute; I said to offer it as an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would be an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. STONE. Oh, no.

Mr. BAILEY. It would be offered as an addition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An addition; the Chair begs pardon.

Mr. BACON. I desire to suggest that it would not be within the province of the Chair to make a ruling at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is right.

Mr. BACON. That is an impossibility.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would like to suggest——

Mr. BACON. The only thing the Chair can do now is to indicate what his opinion may be, and from that may be drawn a conclusion as to what his ruling will be; but certainly the Chair can not now make a ruling.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia is right. It was a mere suggestion upon the part of the Chair.
